

How Would Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Inspire the Nation if He Were Alive Today?

Martin Luther King Jr. was one of the most influential people of our past, and still is today. His “I Have a Dream” speech stands as one of the most powerful speeches ever given in the history of our country. America has come so far from where it was hundreds of years ago, but there is plenty of room for us to keep improving. If Martin Luther King Jr. was alive today, he would be a strong leader in the movement toward becoming the best country we can be, with equality for all people.

Martin Luther King Jr. would first inspire us to be united. “We cannot walk alone,” said King decades ago. This powerful statement reflects that our nation functions best when we are all on the same side. Sure, there are always going to be opposing opinions, but we need to learn how to accept the opinions of others and be willing to see from other points of view. Due to current circumstances in our world today, it is crucial that we remain united throughout everything in order to make the best of it and to come out strong. If King were here to help us realize this, he would help us to get through the tough times as a positive leader.

Martin Luther King Jr. would also advise us all to treat others with kindness. A person’s struggles may not always be obvious. Because of this, we should always treat people with kindness and respect, because we never know what they may be going through. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. once said, “Darkness cannot drive out darkness; only light can do that. Hate cannot drive out hate; only love can do that.” It is common for a person to want to fight back if they are attacked in any way, but fighting back gets you nowhere. If we were to be kind even to those that hate us, the world would be much happier. King would do an incredible job in demonstrating and advocating this now, just as he did when he was alive.

Although our nation has improved significantly from where it was hundreds of years ago in terms of equality for all, there is still plenty of progress that still needs to be made. If Martin Luther King Jr. were alive today, he would definitely help to point us in the right direction toward equality for all races, much like he did when he was alive. He would also be an activist for the LGBTQ community and be a proud leader guiding everyone in the nation to accept and stand with those individuals.

If Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. were alive today, he would inspire the nation by guiding us to be united, to be kind to all, and to stand for equality. As he did in the past, he would be a strong leader toward making our nation the best it could be.
