Narrative Description

Summary Paragraph

The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District encompasses the entirety of the historic Shawnee Neighborhood as well as the far western portion of the historic Portland Neighborhood that was separated when I-264 was constructed through Louisville's west end in the mid-twentieth century. The proposed district covers approximately 1,400 acres and is bounded on the west by the Ohio River, on the south by West Broadway, on the east by I-264, and on the north by I-64. The district consists of all manner of resources consistent with the neighborhood's historic use including single-family residential buildings, multi-family residential buildings, educational facilities, religious facilities, commercial buildings, industrial buildings, recreational facilities, and significant thoroughfares and landscapes. The district has resources that range from ca. 1892, the year that the Olmsted-designed Shawnee Park was constructed, through the twenty-first century. Its Period of Significance begins in 1892, the year the Shawnee Park was built, and continues through 1980, the year that African American population reached over 88 percent of the neighborhood, marking a distinct change from the 59 percent the decade before and cementing the change of from the original whites-only neighborhood, to an integrated neighborhood, and finally to a neighborhood that had transitioned into almost entirely African American. Although the district contains resources that are less than 50 years old, Criteria Consideration G does not apply because, in addition to meeting the established markers for assessing and determining a district's eligibility, "there is sufficient perspective to consider the properties as historic" within the established contexts and "the majority of district properties are over 50 years old."¹ The district features notable resources including Shawnee Park and associated parkways, an eclectic mix of high-style and modest housing, major thoroughfares and landscape feature, commercial buildings, and religious and educational facilities, all of which are befitting a self-sustaining neighborhood of this size. The district as a whole conveys its historic identity as an important neighborhood in Louisville's history, both as the only neighborhood to develop as a direct result of an Olmsted Park, but also as a transitional neighborhood during desegregation and the Long Civil Rights Movement. The district features 4520 Contributing resources and 560 Non-Contributing resources.

General Setting of the District

The neighborhood is largely broken up into four separate components, all of which combine to make the cohesive Shawnee Neighborhood. The first, and most significant, is the public parkland on the western extent of the district, consisting of both the Olmsted-designed Shawnee Park and the Shawnee Golf Course. The second is the commercial corridors that line the major thoroughfares, primarily the east/west streets such as West Market Street, West Broadway, W. Muhammad Ali Boulevard, formerly Walnut, and others. These roads not only correspond to the early streetcar lines in Louisville that served the west end, but they also mark the areas in the neighborhood with the largest collection of commercial buildings, however there are outliers that exist on side streets and connecting roads. The third component consists of the Parkway system that was implemented at the same time as the Olmsted Park System. These parkways mark some of the earliest planned transportation routes in Shawnee and consist of beautified, tree-lined roadways with larger homes, some of which have been transformed from single-family dwellings into other uses, particularly apartments. The fourth, and largest component, is the various subdivided residential areas that make up the heart of Shawnee. Throughout the early 20th century, Shawnee developed gradually, resulting in numerous subdivided residential pockets through the neighborhood. Schools, churches, and community recreation centers emerged both along the main thoroughfares as well as among the residential pockets. The eventual desegregation of Shawnee is essential to understanding the history of the neighborhood, however it was relatively non-existent prior to the 1950s, and when it began, it did so in the northern and eastern portions, as African Americans moved in from other, historically predominantly black communities.²

Outside of the boundaries, the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District is surrounded by both the Ohio River to the north and west, as well as other Louisville west end neighborhoods that were significant in their own rights, but for different reasons. To the east exists the Portland and Russell neighborhoods, both of which have National Register-listed historic districts. The Portland Historic District (NR #80001615), also known as the Old Portland Residential District, consists of the original heart of the development of the City of Portland, which was once an independent city and rival of Louisville in the early 19th century. There have been steps made in recent years to expand this district to encompass the entirety of the historic Portland Neighborhood to more accurately tell the story of the development of Portland and not just its earliest years. The Russell Historic District (NR #80001617) consists of the heart of the residential portions of the historic Russell Neighborhood, which is significant as the first residential enclave for middle-class black Louisvillians in the early 20th century and as a significant collection of late 19th and early 20th century architecturally significant houses. Russell shares some similarities with Shawnee, but Russell became an established black neighborhood by 1925, where Shawnee evolved as a transitional neighborhood without a great deal of African American residents until white flight increased during the Civil Rights Movement in the 1960s.

To the south of the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District is the Chickasaw Neighborhood Historic District (NR #SG100010766). That district is significant under the Areas of Significance of Ethnic History-Black and Social History-Civil Rights. The Chickasaw Neighborhood was part of the original Little Africa neighborhood in Louisville, a place that was populated by many southern African Americans who sought out Louisville during the Great Migration. The Chickasaw Neighborhood's history is inextricably linked with African American settlement and development, while Shawnee is more a transitional neighborhood which was largely established before African Americans began settling there en masse, after the 1950s.

The built environment of Shawnee, in its general layout/configuration, from the early-to-mid-twentieth century, has remained. There are obvious changes on a small scale, such as a building demolition or construction of a new multi-family complex, but the overall design and flow of the neighborhood is unchanged. Aside from the construction of I-264, which created a hard eastern boundary for the neighborhood, there have been no large-scale alterations, leaving the four components of the neighborhood more or less intact over the years.

Most of the residential subdivisions within the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District were platted and completed between the early 20th century and the mid 1920s, however there are some outliers that were developed in the mid-twentieth century and even one that dates from the 1990s. Similarly, the individual buildings within the proposed district span from the late nineteenth century through the twenty first. While the resource table below attempts to demonstrate the date of construction of each of the resources within the district, many of these dates are approximate and cannot be precisely verified. While the majority of the dates were gathered from the Jefferson County (Louisville) Property Valuation Administration (PVA) and are merely estimates (the PVA regularly assigns 1900 for historic buildings that have no other documented age). However, while the PVA dates are approximations, other methods of estimation were readily available, such as the utilization of Sanborn Fire Insurance Maps, United States Geological Survey (USGS) Topographic maps, and other documentation including the year of establishment and platting of each separate subdivision in the neighborhood. This information is key in understanding the development, growth, and changes occurring in the neighborhood over the years.

Physical Character of the District

The spatial layout and infrastructure of the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District can be seen as a physical depiction of the ongoing growth that the area experienced in the early twentieth century through the 1920s while the physical makeup of the individual resources within tell the story of how the neighborhood has fared since. The layout of the neighborhood is intentional and practical, stemming both from established features from the earliest development of the area and from the ease, feasibility, and ways in which the land was owned and thus subdivided. The earliest features of the neighborhood that informed its eventual layout were the establishment of the park and associated parkways and the construction of the first roads and streetcars to service the west end. The park continued to be the main draw with the parkways serving as major residential streets and busy byways, and the earliest roads and streetcar lines predictably turned into major commercial corridors and main thoroughfares.

Continued development and growth in Shawnee in the early twentieth century was completed mostly on a basic grid-like pattern, with some exceptions. This design was not only informed by the ownership of the land, which was mostly in square and rectangular parcels allowing for the necessary construction of streets and alleys, but it was also completed this way to present the ideal residential neighborhood. Shawnee is made up of several small subdivisions and additions that were designed to present a cohesive, residential space, complete with easy access to major roadways, streetcars, and local amenities.

Unlike other early Louisville neighborhoods, Shawnee does not exhibit a large number of Shotgun type houses, as these houses were waning in popularity toward the end of the 19th century when development in Shawnee began. As such, in the 1910s, Craftsman Bungalows became the prevalent style house as they were popular, inexpensive to construct, and more attractive to a middle-class demographic.

The layout of the Shawnee Neighborhood is similar to what is typical in urban neighborhoods established in the early 20th century. Residents in Shawnee could take the streetcar to work, but for a growing number of workers, automobiles and homes were within reach of ownership. Thus, during the first decades of the twentieth century, when development was accelerating in Shawnee, neighborhoods were built with houses that shared similar traits. Lots were typically similar in size and shape, with narrow lots and decent, but sometimes shallow, setbacks which allow for a front yard while leaving ample room behind the house. There is a great deal of uniformity in the district's rectangular lots, from the northernmost residential streets to those along the south end. There were exceptions, namely along the busier roads and prettier parkways, which accommodated the desires of wealthier owners who wanted a more desirable lot. An important point that distinguishes one subdivision from another in Shawnee is the absence or presence of driveways. Each subdivision exhibits a different choice on this point—some opting for wider lots that could accommodate a driveway while others elected for narrower lots. Some subdivisions feature rear alleyways to

Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District

Jefferson County, Kentucky

Name of Property

County and State

accommodate a rear garage in lieu of side drives. However the developer chose, the choice indicates an increasing popularity and availability of automobiles during the development era.

Different from our current subdivisions that are homogenized by zoning, Shawnee's residential areas held commercial, community, religious, and municipal buildings and spaces. The main thoroughfares also had higher intensity commercial clusters. As a result, Shawnee retains the appearance of a self-contained walkable neighborhood with the feeling of a cohesive community.

Neighborhood Resources

The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District consists of mostly single-family residential properties, however there is a substantial number of commercial buildings, religious facilities, educational facilities, medical facilities, recreational space, and community and municipal properties. This is very commonplace among large residential neighborhoods, as they were essentially self-sustaining entities, developed at a time when easy cross-county travel was not available to all potential residents.

The change to Shawnee's historic landscape, is the construction of multi-family complexes. Originally, Shawnee was a neighborhood of single-family houses, a 20th century suburb in the west end of Louisville. It was not until the mid-to-late twentieth century, when the neighborhood properties began to lose value in their single-family use that the neighborhood became a target market for multi-family housing. Large, previously single-family dwellings were converted to multi-family homes, new apartment buildings were built on empty lots or on lots where houses were demolished, and buildings that once served other purposes, such as schools, were repurposed for multi-family housing. This shift is a consequence of white owners migrating to further-outlying suburbs of Louisville, which diminished Shawnee's property values. The erection of multi-family housing provided more affordable housing for African Americans, but introduced a new neighborhood dynamic in which absentee corporate landlords had a greater impact on the social fabric of the neighborhood than they had had before the 1960s.

Architectural Features in the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District

The majority of the resources within the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District lack individual architectural distinction that normally is associated with individual National Register listing under Criterion C, although the neighborhood was established first as an affluent community in Louisville's West End, a place that was adjacent to the beautiful Olmsted Park. The earliest buildings make up the majority of the resources with any prominent architectural attributes. The rest of the neighborhood was established in the first decades of the 20th century, when upper-middle class Louisvillians wanted to purchase a modest, practical home in a style that was popular at the time. The Craftsman Bungalow fit that social desire, especially as it seemed a more affluent choice to the ubiquitous Shotgun house popularized in the late-nineteenth century. While some bungalows feature architectural embellishment, the majority of them in Shawnee do not. Similarly, most of the non-residential buildings in the district lack also architectural adornment. The obvious exceptions to this pattern lie with the educational and religious facilities, both of which tended to feature architectural ornamentation and be built in high-styles, or styles that encourage the use of elaborate or style-specific features.

Project Methodology

First, a comprehensive list of all extant district resources was compiled using information obtained from the Jefferson County Property Valuation Administrator, the local tax office. Moreover, this data was utilized to obtain a construction date for each parcel, which includes key attributes such as parcel number, improvements to the property, and other key information such as square footage, zoning, and owner. Along with current and historic photographs, which help identify how the building has changed over the years, the key dataset used for the purposes of this nomination is the construction year. The construction date offered by the PVA office was often an estimate. When dates are unknown, the PVA often used a placeholder date of 1900. This usually indicates a rough approximation, meaning the building could be built some thirty years before or after 1900. When such examples were found in Shawnee, one of this project's preservation professionals would estimate the date of construction using experience, as well as consulting historic maps such as atlases, Sanborn Fire Insurance maps, and USGS topographic maps. Additionally, other steps were taken to identify whether or not that resource will be labeled Contributing or Non-Contributing. These steps are outlined below. The PVA date of construction is regarded as more reliable for dates after 1980.

As is commonplace among working-class neighborhoods, especially those that have a history spanning over one hundred years, many of the buildings have undergone material changes. These changes can include replacement of exterior material, small additions, and a change in fenestration. Additionally, some resources have experienced more noticeable and severe changes, such as unsympathetic additions. Many such changes occurred during the historic period; others have occurred afterward. These changes largely, however, are seen as a part of the definable character of working-class neighborhoods, meaning that working-class families, who are often financially burdened in ways that affluent families in nicer neighborhoods are not, pride themselves on remodeling their house, even if it is in ways that fall outside of the Secretary of the Interior's Standards for Rehabilitation, used by SHPOs, cities with local historic preservation ordinances, and the preservation community in general. Such an example seen throughout working-class communities is in the replacement, or covering, of original exterior wall cladding with something newer, "prettier," and easier to maintain, such as vinyl siding. The same is true for replacement windows. Within the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District, alterations will be gauged for how they impact a resource's ability to contribute to the district's historic sense of time and place, not the change's impact on the neighborhood as a highly aesthetic architectural resource. A building will be considered Contributing as long as the building still conveys its form, features, and details necessary to reinforce the district's historic identity. These determinations were made for each building that was built within the Period of Significance and are outlined in the table below.

System used to Evaluate Contributing and Non-contributing Resources

As a whole, the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District retains the five aspects of integrity that generally relates to historic significance: location, design, setting, materials, and association. Each resource within the district was reviewed and certain aspects of integrity were weighed more heavily than others because the resources are pieces of a larger, more cohesive district. What defines the significance of Shawnee is its ability to communicate its historic identity as a middle-to-upper-class neighborhood built during the pre-WWII period, and how the neighborhood tells

Jefferson County, Kentucky

Name of Property

County and State

the story of a neighborhood's demographic transition during the Post-WWII period. The buildings in Shawnee document the racial tensions and demographic shifts in Louisville neighborhoods, driven by prejudice and legalized discrimination. They tell the story of an economically thriving, affluent white community that, over the course of a few decades and various incidents, turned into a redlined and racially segregated neighborhood that thrived as a community and defined itself in spite of the discriminatory practices and racial hatred. Shawnee remains the best example of a large-scale Louisville neighborhood making a wholesale social change, from a legally segregated, affluent white community to a successful middle-class black suburban enclave in the city, all of which occurred in spite of countless measures taken by the federal, state, and local governments, and by white neighbors, to derail that transition.

The following details the architectural ranking system utilized in this nomination to determine which resources were Contributing and which were Non-Contributing, and to explain the basis of judgement and evaluation applied each resource. Even nominations selecting Criterion A as their basis for eligibility require a system to evaluate the contribution of each property, so that a credible judgment on the district's integrity can be given.

In the case for buildings in Shawnee, a resource might have been altered over time; however, those modifications can be just as important as the original historic fabric because they illustrate the cultural value and history of a property. Therefore, if the extant resources retain enough historic features and form to convey their original construction and use, then they should be contributing elements to the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District. The Historic Integrity Assessment Tool for the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District (Contributing and Non-Contributing) was utilized to help review the integrity of the resources by ranking each resource in one of four categories.

Rank 1: These properties are contributing as they possess a high level of material and design intactness. They retain historic materials, original window and door openings, character-defining features, and building form. These buildings look very much like they did historically. See photographic examples below.

- Porch enclosures or removals: Porches should be mostly intact and remain unenclosed.
- Replacement cladding: Historic cladding material should be mostly intact.
- Replacement doors and windows: Historic doors and windows should be mostly intact.
- New additions: New additions should be located on the rear elevation and not highly visible from the front façade.

Rank 2: These properties are contributing but have less intactness than a 1 ranking. They retain some historic materials, original window and door openings, character-defining features, and building form. The buildings are more altered than Rank 1 buildings, but they still look very much like they did historically. See photographic examples below.

- Porch enclosures or removals: The porch remains discernable with the presence of columns or column bases, steps, and/or the use of reversible enclosure materials such as glazing panels.
- Replacement cladding: Deemed acceptable if it approximates historic siding in dimension and reveal.
- Replacement doors and windows: Deemed acceptable if the majority of historic opening locations and dimensions remain intact and the replacement windows and/or doors do not significantly change the building's historic character.
- New additions: New additions should be located on the rear elevation and not highly visible from the front façade.

669 Southwestern Pkwy

3913 W. Muhammad Ali Blvd.

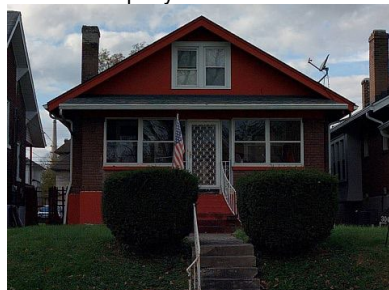

4136 W. Muhammad Ali Blvd.

Rank 3: These properties are those with the lowest level of intactness that still are considered to Contribute. The buildings are more altered than Rank 1 or Rank 2 buildings; however, they retain enough historic materials to be somewhat similar to how they would have looked historically. See photographic examples below.

- Porch enclosures or removals: The porch remains discernable with the presence of columns or column bases, steps, and/or the use of reversible enclosure materials such as vinyl, aluminum, and/or wood siding. Generally, the installation of doors and windows does not detract from the integrity of the enclosed porch because the other porch features remain intact.
- Replacement cladding: Deemed acceptable if it approximates historic siding (vinyl or aluminum) or if it dates to the period of significance such as permastone or asbestos shingle siding.
- Replacement doors and windows: Deemed acceptable if the majority of historic opening locations and dimensions remain intact and/or the replacement windows and/or doors do not significantly change the building's historic character.
- New additions: New additions should be located on the rear elevation and not highly visible from the front façade. However, if additions date to the period of significance and do not substantially alter the building's form or massing, they could retain historic integrity.

Rank 4: These properties are noncontributing as they have lost their form, window and door openings, and/or many historic materials. These buildings are no longer recognizable as having once been a historic element of the neighborhood. See photographic examples below. Of course, a building which was constructed after the close of the Period of Significance would also be Non-contributing.

- Porch enclosures or removals: The permanent enclosure of porches through the removal of all identifying features and the use of a more permanent siding material like masonry make front porches appear more like additions on the front façade.
- Replacement cladding: Unsympathetic replacement materials, such as brick veneer on frame structures, that date after the period of significance and substantially alter a building's historic appearance.
- Replacement doors and windows: If the majority of the historic fenestration pattern is modified; or if the majority of windows and/or doors are removed and/or relocated; or if unsympathetic replacement doors and/or windows are installed, then this is typically deemed a major, unsympathetic alteration.
- New additions: Additions that are located on the front façade or are substantial in size and alter the building's form and massing, lead to a noncontributing determination. These additions should typically date after the Period of Significance.

Statement of Significance

Summary Paragraph

The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District, which has previously been determined eligible for listing in the NRHP, meets National Register Criterion A and is significant in the area of Community Planning and Design within the historic context of “Suburban Development around the Olmsted Parks and Parkway System in Louisville, Kentucky” as well as the area of Ethnic Heritage: African American History within the context of “Transitional Neighborhoods in Louisville, Kentucky, during Desegregation and the Long Civil Rights Movement.” The Shawnee Neighborhood, which began as a response to the Olmsted Park and Parkway System, grew from a suburb first populated by upper-class whites, to an upper-middle to middle-class white neighborhood, and finally as a majority African American neighborhood as white flight, widespread racial housing discrimination, and legislation following the Long Civil Rights Movement. Nowhere else in the City of Louisville can such a stark transition be seen in the built environment, nor can be seen playing on the landscape to such a large degree. The Period of Significance, 1892-1980, begins with the establishment and opening of the Shawnee Park, which attracted the earliest residential development in the neighborhood, and ends with a date when the African American population reached over 88 percent. This identifies the area as having completely transitioned from a white neighborhood to a mixed-race neighborhood, and finally to a neighborhood that was made up of predominantly African Americans, and thus tells an often painful story of Louisville’s struggle for citizen rights.

Historic Context: Suburban Development around the Olmsted Parks and Parkway System in Louisville, Kentucky

Brief History of the Shawnee Neighborhood

In the years between the establishment of the Commonwealth of Kentucky and the last decade of the nineteenth century, the area that eventually became the Shawnee Neighborhood was largely used for dairy farms and miscellaneous agricultural activities.³ This activity continued through the Civil War until, as the industrial boom in Louisville began, the urban sprawl started to slowly find its way west of the City. It was during these years that the City’s growth spread into its western reaches, as the river limited growth to the north, the highlands and established estates limited had begun to define the east, and swampland was present to the south.⁴

In 1891, the City of Louisville hired “The Father of Landscape Architecture,” Frederick Law Olmsted, to design a city-wide park system.⁵ He was charged with designing an entire park system, complete with parkways that interconnected the open spaces with the rest of the city. In Louisville,

Olmsted designed three major parks that were unified by planned parkways. The three parks—Cherokee, Iroquois, and Shawnee—played off the natural and geographic characteristics of the areas in which they were designed. These significant parks were then to be connected by the Algonquin, Southwestern, Northwestern, Eastern, and Southern Parkways. Overall, the entire park system helped define and unify Louisville's growth as a City. Shawnee Park, which as its name suggests, is located in the Shawnee Neighborhood, is situated next to the Ohio River and is just over 181 acres. Different from the City's other two hilly parks, Shawnee Park's terrain is flat, affording its visitors excellent views of the river and the scenic Indiana knobs. With the park at the edge of town, it encouraged visitors to reflect upon Louisville's limits, to be inspired to envision what might lie beyond the present.⁶

Basil Doerhoefer, tobacco merchant and burgeoning real estate developer, built his home in western Louisville to capitalize on the presence of Shawnee Park. Doerhoefer and other speculators lay the groundwork for residential districts and buildings that arose around Shawnee Park and the associated parkways. In 1895, just three years after the opening of Shawnee Park, the city opted to annex the park and some of the surrounding land, which included part of the Shawnee Neighborhood, with the rest being annexed a couple decades later. During this time, the City commissioned electric streetcars to replace the horse and mule-drawn carts that had been shuttling visitors to the park. Thus, before 1900, wealthy Louisvillians, drawn by the large lots, spacious area, access to the park and river, and the attraction of the major parkways, built Shawnee's first homes, which are as architecturally impressive as other houses near the parks.⁷

Shortly after the initial subdividing efforts in Shawnee, Fontaine Ferry Park, the city's premier amusement park, was opened along the banks of the Ohio on the far western reaches of the city offering first-rate attractions for the entire family. About two decades following the opening of Fontaine Ferry Park, the Shawnee Golf Course was constructed, becoming one of the older courses in the state, which further established Shawnee as an up-and-coming neighborhood, one that encouraged suburbanization into Louisville's west end. Fontaine Ferry Park, the construction of the streetcars and parkways, and the largely undeveloped nature of the area prompted developers to turn their eyes to Shawnee and begin initiating subdivisions in the area. By the turn of the century, other West End neighborhoods, such as Portland, were already well established and densely packed, but what would become the Shawnee Neighborhood left plenty of land open to interested developers and homeowners.

Over the years, Shawnee experienced three major events that shaped its growth and residential development. The first was the establishment of Shawnee Park. This initiated interest in the area and brought not only developers, but wealthy residents, a practical city streetcar line, and commercially successful businesses to the neighborhood. The second defining era occurred in the late 1930s through the end of World War II when a combination of the aftermath from the devastating 1937 flood, and the housing boom following the war and the GI Bill spurred a change of the neighborhood's demographic with many of the upper-class white families moving to the suburbs and higher ground leaving the area to consist of predominantly middle-class and working-class white people with an increase in African American residency. The final major shift occurred over the couple decades following the passing of Civil Rights laws such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Open Housing Ordinance of 1967, and the Fair Housing Act of 1968. During these years, Shawnee experienced a severe and unmistakable white flight that produced a rapid shift in demographic from predominantly working-class white people to upper-to-middle-class African Americans.

The Development of the Olmsted Parkway System

The most influential event in the early history of the Shawnee neighborhood was the establishment and construction of Shawnee Park and the associated parkways. In 1890, the City of Louisville and the Board of Parks Commissioners “established by law and vote of the people” their intent to have a significant park in each area of the city: the west, south, and east.⁸ The following year, Frederick Law Olmsted, perhaps the most well-known landscape architect in American history, was contracted to develop the city’s plan and make it a reality. Ultimately, Olmsted’s idea centered on the idea of three large regional parks with a series of five parkways connecting them to each other and rest of the city. The three parks were Shawnee, Cherokee, and Iroquois with the parkways being Northwestern, Southwestern, Algonquin, Southern, and Eastern. The city park commissioners, made up of several prominent business leaders, chose to name the parks after three tribes whose origins trace back to Kentucky as a way to memorialize the “original owners of the soil.”⁹ Building on that idea, Olmsted also arranged for smaller parks and playgrounds to be interspersed throughout the city to make recreational activities more available to all of Louisville’s citizens.¹⁰

Olmsted developed the philosophies and standards that would be forever associated with landscape architecture. Of these ideologies, one of the key principles that he would employ in his designs, including the expansive park and parkway system in Louisville, is the “Seven S-es” of Design¹²:

- Scenery – Design of ‘passages of scenery’ even in the small spaces and in areas intended for active use. Creation of designs that give an enhanced sense of space: indefinite boundaries, constant opening up of new views. Avoidance of hard-edge or specimen planting, creating instead designs that have either ‘considerable complexity of light and shadow near the eyes’ or ‘obscurity of detail further away.’
- Suitability – Creation of designs that are in keeping with the natural scenery and topography of the site: respect for, and full utilization of, the ‘genius of the place.’

- Style – Designing in specific styles, each for a particular effect. Primarily in the ‘Pastoral’ style (open greensward with small bodies of water and scattered trees and groves) for a soothing, restorative atmosphere, or in the ‘Picturesque’ style (profuse planting, especially with shrubs, creepers and ground cover, on steep and broken terrain), for a sense of the richness and bounteousness of nature, with chiaroscuro effects of light and shade to produce a sense of mystery.
- Subordination – Subordination of all elements, all features and objects, to the overall design and the effect it is intended to achieve. The “Art to conceal Art.”
- Separation – Separation of areas designed in different styles, so that an “incongruous mixture of styles” will not dilute the intended effect of each: separation of ways, in order to insure safety of use and reduce distractions for those using the space; separation of conflicting or incompatible uses.
- Sanitation – Provision for adequate drainage and other engineering considerations, not simply arranging of surface features. Planning or designs so that they promote both the physical and mental health of users.
- Service – Planning and designs so that they will serve a “purpose of direct utility or services”; that is, the place will meet fundamental social and psychological needs: “So long as considerations of utility are neglected or overridden by considerations of ornament, there will be no true Art.”¹³

In addition to the foundational impact that his park system had on Louisville, the uniqueness of it, and the inclusion of the extensive parkway system, remains equally as formative. The parkways were designed in a way that they would act essentially as linear parks, acting as extensions of the designed green spaces and organized in a way that encouraged the interaction between the city and nature. Olmsted’s vision called for tree-lined parkways that were wide enough to accommodate green medians and used exclusively for pleasure travel. While the ultimate design adopted by Louisville did not mirror Olmsted’s vision exactly, partially because of funding and the inability to acquire the right-of-way needed in many cases for Olmsted’s ideal 200-ft wide parkway, it still offered a system for Louisville residents to navigate the city, enjoy a pleasurable and aesthetically pleasing parkway, and gain easy access to large recreational green spaces that ultimately defined the growth of the city as a whole (Figure 2 and Figure 3).¹⁴

The establishment of Shawnee Park and the three Parkway that branch from it, the Algonquin, Northwestern, and Southwestern, which collectively were thought of as the western parkways, not only demonstrated that the city of Louisville was investing in the west end, but it signaled to developers and Louisvillians that the city was expanding. Some of the earliest residents and even the developers themselves, built impressive houses along the scenic parkways and next to the park while other amenities, like electrified rail lines and new roads soon followed allowing for the rest of the area to be subdivided and developed. Without the construction of Shawnee Park and the associated parkways, the Shawnee Neighborhood would not exist, or at least not in the way we know it today.

Development of the Shawnee Neighborhood around the Olmsted Park and Parkway System

The Shawnee neighborhood did not exist prior to the 1890s. While there were some residences, predominantly farmhouses dotting the rural landscape, there were no established residential areas or communities. This all changed with the establishment of Shawnee Park and the associated parkways. This investment from the City of Louisville prompted an interest in the west end leading to major developers subdividing massive swaths of land in order to appeal to the ever-expanding Louisville population. Leading up to, and just following, the turn of the twentieth century, Louisville was growing rapidly and trying to expand its suburban footprint. In the west end, this happened with the formal annexation of Shawnee Park and some of the surrounding land in 1895, with the rest of the neighborhood getting annexed in 1912. The neighborhood that grew here naturally took its name from the park whose construction prompted the neighborhood's development, although, for years, many Louisvillians and even maps referred to this area simply as West Louisville.

Even before the creation of Shawnee Park and the sprawl of Louisville residents, the City of Louisville had extended its streetcar lines out as far as the Ohio River on the city's west end. The expansion of the city's rail system was directly tied to the city's industrial economy and the growth that it foretold.¹⁶ By the 1870s, there was a public rail transportation system that reached every region in Jefferson County. Originally, the outskirts of the city were serviced by horse and mule-drawn streetcars but by the early twentieth century, many of the lines had been electrified. In the case of Shawnee, an 1891 map shows that the only streetcar line, which ran along Market Street, transferred to mule-car before reaching the far west end, but by 1906, there were two electric lines, one along Broadway that reached the southern boundary of Shawnee Park, and one on Market that serviced Fontaine Ferry Park, and finally, by 1916, the demand had grown and the city had expanded so much that a third line was added along Madison that reached the northern boundary of the park (Figure 4 and Figure 5).¹⁷

The initial wave of development began concurrently with, and immediately following, the construction of Shawnee Park. Basil Doerhoefer, a successful entrepreneur in the tobacco industry began his large-scale land acquisition after selling his tobacco company in 1891 and between 1893 and 1903, he purchased roughly 2 square miles of land in Louisville's west end. At this point, "he owned most of the land on both sides of Broadway between Thirty-fifth Street and the park."¹⁸ Doerhoefer, along with other notable developers, began platting their land in the west end around the turn of the twentieth century, accounting for small, one- and two-block subdivisions off the main thoroughfares.¹⁹

Simultaneously with the subdivision of land by the big developers, the area saw a wave of development around the Ohio River, Shawnee Park, and the associated scenic parkways. Many of the neighborhood's largest and most architecturally significant estates and houses were built along the parkways and near the park, as this was a premier location. Further to the east, smaller streets began to pop up with residences consisting primarily of working-class housing, much more modest than the large estates that lined the parkways, the park, and the other major thoroughfares in the area, such as Broadway and Market Street.

One of the biggest supports to area development was construction of Fontaine Ferry Park (often colloquially referred to, and portrayed on maps as, Fountain Ferry Park). Fontaine Ferry Park was Louisville's preeminent amusement park, a precursor to the giant theme parks seen today, complete with a large swimming pool, roller skating rinks, attractions for all ages, rides and more. The park arose from an earlier idea by an entrepreneur named Tony Landenwich, who in 1887 purchased a flatboat ferry service landing called Fontaine's Ferry and built an entertainment retreat with a hotel, restaurant, bandstand, and bicycle racetrack with grandstand.²⁰ In 1903, the area was purchased by Hopkins Amusements of St. Louis who then commissioned John Miller, the architect of Palisades Park in New Jersey, to build a large-scale amusement park. Just two years later, in 1905, Fontaine Ferry Park was opened to the public. Patrons could travel to the park via steamboats, a benefit to being located on the banks of the Ohio River, or by streetcar, as it was the turnaround site and end of the line for Louisville's Market Street route.²¹ The park immediately experienced success and it continued to thrive for several decades. It was the only park of its kind in Louisville and provided one more attraction for Louisville citizens to consider living in the far west end.

The surge of development that began in the early years of the twentieth century intensified as electric streetcars began to serve the area. By the 1920s, nearly all of the Shawnee neighborhood had been subdivided and mostly developed, with a grid-like pattern of roads servicing most of the neighborhood with some smaller, irregular streets interspersed. There were few developed subdivisions in the nineteenth century, but by 1905, they became a regular occurrence every few years. Between 1905 and 1915, over 25 subdivisions were recorded in the Shawnee neighborhood, with a slight lull occurring just after this period, largely due to WWI. Subdivisions began again following the end of the war, and by 1930, nearly all of Shawnee was subdivided.²²

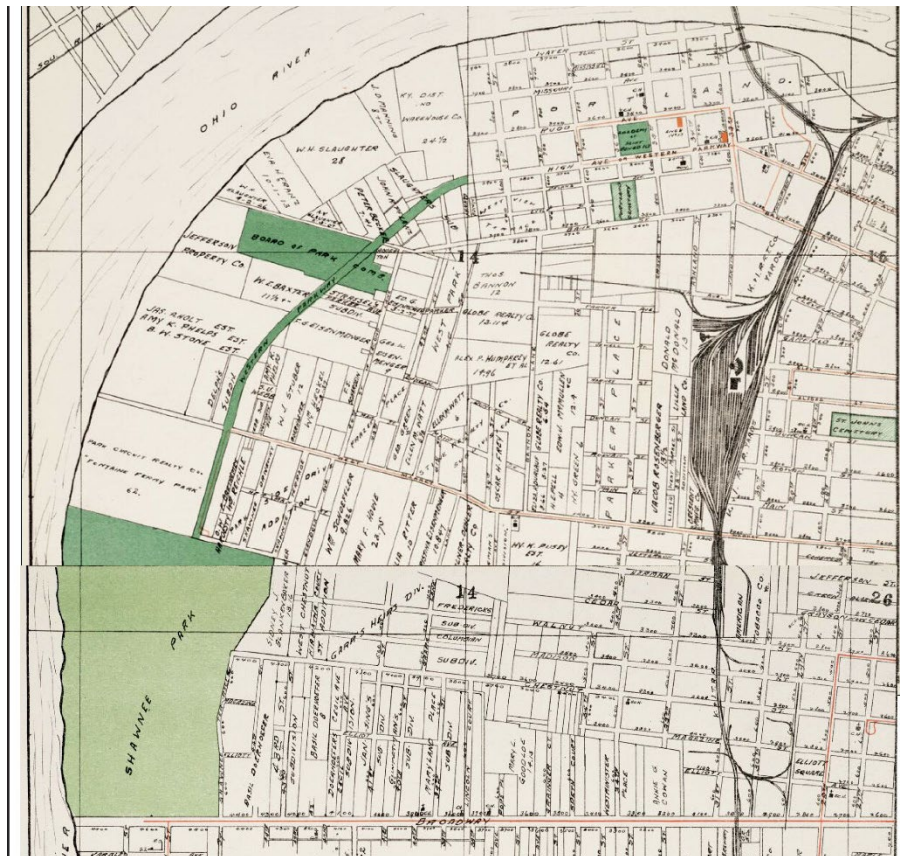

Figure 7. 1913 Louisville Title Company's Map of Louisville and Jefferson County, Kentucky. Note that many of the neighborhood's roads have been constructed, plots subdivided, and subdivisions platted.²³

The 1928 Sanborn Fire Insurance Maps produced in the area show that by that point, nearly every city block within the Shawnee neighborhood was developed to capacity, with the exception of the occasional empty parcels or side streets that had not been developed yet.²⁴ These maps show that the majority of Shawnee was made up of middle-class housing stock with the occasional commercial property and industrial complex scattered throughout and the larger, more impressive residential buildings along the parkways, near the park, and along other major transportation routes.

In the early 1920s, there was a stretch of land along the bank of the Ohio River, north of Fontaine Ferry Park, that remained undeveloped. It is unclear as to the reason, but one can only assume that location on the lowlands by the river, an area that is prone to flooding, played a large part of the decision. Historic maps differ somewhat in terms of the ownership and purpose of the land. The 1913 map shows various parcels owned by multiple owners while a 1925 map indicates that the City of Louisville owned a large portion just north of Fontaine Ferry, but with the area even further north, at the bend in Northwestern Parkway, being awkwardly platted and matching earlier maps, leading one to believe there were still multiple owners.²⁵ Furthermore, the 1928 Sanborn Maps indicate that the area was proposed for development. Despite the ambiguity in the historic cartographic record, it is known that in 1926, the City of Louisville opened a new municipal golf course in this area: the Shawnee Golf Course. The initial creation consisted of only nine holes, but it was so successful, that in the next two to three years, an additional nine holes were added.²⁶ The course was a success, largely due to its locale along the banks of the Ohio River and the feeling of the course being an extension of the nearby Olmsted Park. In its early years, the Shawnee Golf Course held widespread tournaments, which in turn encouraged an affluent demographic to move to the west end, as golf was predominantly a game for the upper-class. This 1920s development is a consistent outgrowth of the early promotion of Shawnee neighborhood as the domain of the rich who lived along the parkways and near the park.

By the mid-1930s, a shift in the demographics of Shawnee began to occur with many of the more affluent residents moving to the suburbs in Louisville's east end (see, for instance, Country Estates of River Road [NR #99000495] and Mockingbird Valley Historic District (NR #06000815)). While a large portion of Shawnee had been developed with middle-class and working-class residents in mind, particularly evident in the large number of Craftsman bungalows and cottages in the later subdivisions, the major thoroughfares heretofore remained almost exclusively for the wealthy. The cause in this shift in residents was three-fold. The growing industrialization of the central part of the city was giving rise to an equally large-scale suburbanization. The growing affordability of the automobile also served to increase Louisville's residential footprint. Newer subdivisions on Louisville's east end were designed for this next generation of affluent, suburban living with curvilinear streets, private drives, larger lots, and further removal from the liabilities of city life. Moreover, as industrial hubs began to appear across the city (See Irish Hill [NR # SG100010253] and Shelby Park Historic Districts [NR # SG100010247]), the residential developments in close proximity became ideal for the workforce necessary to work the factories and manufacturing centers. In Shawnee, this relationship between residence and workplace could be seen with the nearby Ford factory and plants in Rubbertown. The other major cause of this early stage of suburbanization and abandonment of Shawnee by the well-to-do, was the ubiquitous impact of the Flood of 1937.

In early January, 1937, one of the largest and most destructive floods in American history hit the Ohio River Valley, devastating every river city in the region. Between January 9 and January 23, Louisville experienced nearly continuous rainfall, resulting in the Ohio River reaching a crest of 51.1 feet.²⁷ All of Louisville felt the burden of the flood, but none as much as the communities in the lowlands around the river before any flood protection, such as Shawnee. This catastrophic event eventually led to the City of Louisville to take major steps to protect its residents in the future by building flood walls and other defenses, but by the time construction on those began, many of those who were financially able to leave the hard-hit zones had already done so.²⁸ This was especially true for the Shawnee Neighborhood where there was a major exodus of the affluent residents who once lived along the parkways from the west end to the Highlands and other elevated neighborhoods to the east.²⁹

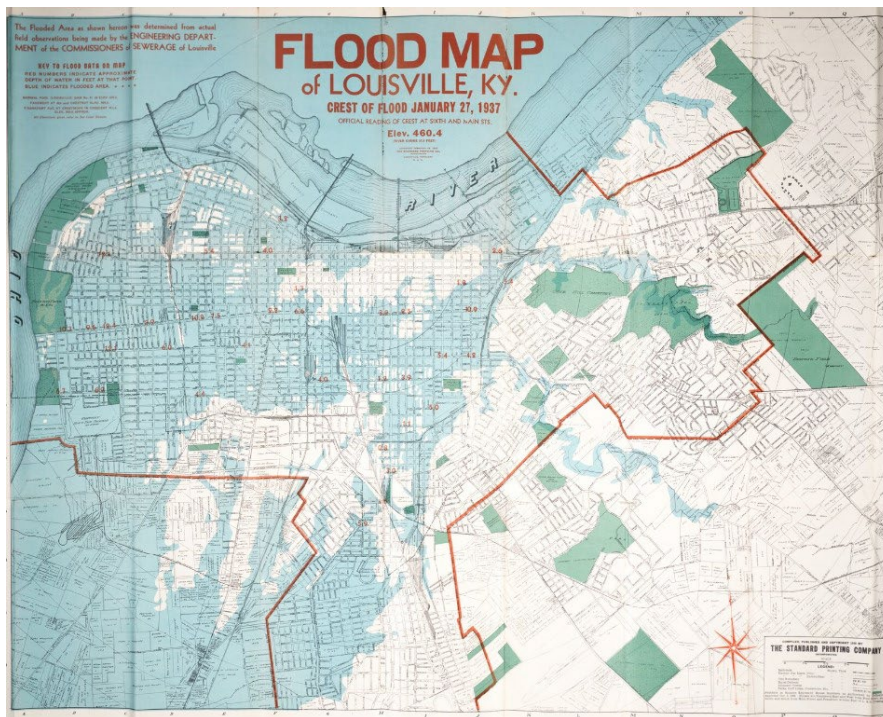

Figure 8. Standard Printing Company's 1937 Flood Map of Louisville, KY showing the crest of the 1937 Flood. Note that the Shawnee neighborhood, on the far west end, next to the green Shawnee Park and Golf Course, is almost entirely inundated.

After the Flood of 1937, residents who could leave Shawnee, largely did, marking the first major out-migration in the neighborhood's history. The new identity of almost entirely white-middle- and working-class residents remained mostly unchanged for the next decade, but the mid-twentieth century brought a much more contested shift in the residential makeup of the area.

In 1933, the New Deal-era's Home-Owner's Loan Corporation (HOLC) was created to prevent home disclosures and increase the housing stock but was more accurately initiated as a federal entity designed to assist widespread redlining across the United States. Redlining, which is the practice of denying access to loans or credit based on where someone lives or their race, was utilized significantly during this time to dictate where African Americans were allowed to live, all while constructing new neighborhoods where they were explicitly excluded from. As such, HOLC created maps throughout the United States that assigned grades to neighborhoods to indicate which were ready for investment and which were to be avoided. In these reports, information such as the level of "infiltration" by non-whites was included as justification for desirability.³⁰

In HOLC's map of Louisville from 1937, the Shawnee neighborhood was categorized into two separate grades. In this map, which was produced immediately following the Flood of 1937, the roads closest to Shawnee Park, Shawnee Golf Course, and the areas along the Parkways were given a "B" rating, indicating that no "foreign born" or black people lived there yet.³¹ However, the eastern portion was given a "C" rating, indicating that there was a presence of African Americans (10 percent) and a heavier presence of industrial activities.³² In this case, HOLC's predictions were off, because while it said that the area was recovering after the flood, it did not account for the abandonment of the affluent residents from the "B" area following the flood's devastation. Regardless, HOLC's map and the associated legislation made it commonplace to restrict areas for black ownership, effectively determining the growth and sustainability of certain neighborhoods.

During this time, HOLC was not the only federal program set up to segregate American cities. Throughout the years leading up to, and during World War II, public housing was in high demand but was explicitly and officially segregated.³³ When American veterans returned home from WWII, the federal government made specific requirements for insuring mortgages, something that was necessary before banks would offer loans to lower income or working-class families, including a prohibition on sales to African Americans.³⁴ Further, federal entities, such as the Federal Housing Administration and Veterans Administration, who many veterans relied upon for home insurance and loans without down payments, not only prohibited African Americans from acquiring loans, but they refused to insure mortgages for white homeowners in neighborhoods that had an African American population, thus further racially segregating the country.³⁵ These were just a couple of the policies that affected every major American city and resulted in outright, obvious and almost total, segregation.

Following WWII, the availability of the automobile and accessible transportation, the availability of home loans to white veterans, and the growing housing stock in Louisville’s suburbs helped lead to a massive suburbanization of the city with people moving south and east to areas previously undeveloped (see for instance, “Suburban Development in Louisville and Jefferson County 1868-

1940” p. 4-14 of Jefferson County MRA [NR #64500236] and Southern Heights-Beechmont Historic District (Boundary Increase [NR # BC100010767]). The city was coming off the booming wartime economy and this subsequently led to rural farms on the city’s outskirts to get subdivided into tracts for suburban neighborhoods.³⁶ Shawnee succumbed to this widespread white flight, creating an opportunity for middle- to upper-class African American families to access more of the neighborhood, however some white residents refused to be influenced and instead sought to fight back against the area’s new residents.

Despite the widespread white flight that much of Louisville was experiencing, many whites in the west end refused to leave, instead organizing, contesting, and occasionally getting violent to prevent African Americans from purchasing homes and living in the area. One such example resulted in white neighbors being so upset, that they raised enough money to buy a house back from an African American family at an inflated price while another example, likely the best known, resulted in the dynamiting of an African American family’s home (see Wade-Braden District, NR# SG100010246).³⁷

In Shawnee, in 1950, a group of 100 white families banded together to form the Shawnee Foundation, a group whose only purpose was to raise enough money to buy houses in order to prevent African American families from doing so. Shortly after, roughly 400 white residents created the Shawnee Homeowners Association in an effort to reintroduce and enforce deed restrictions keeping African Americans out of the neighborhood.³⁸ The areas along the major roadways that were historically more affluent were the last to desegregate. In the 1960s, during the protests at Fontaine Ferry Park for the park’s desegregation, nearby white residents met the protests in droves, still seeking to keep African Americans out. These efforts eventually fell flat, and over the next decades, Shawnee became predominantly African American.

In the latter half of the twentieth century, Shawnee underwent a steady demographic shift that correlated with larger trends in Louisville around widespread desegregation. As desegregation began to become commonplace, or at least somewhat enforced, neighborhoods tended to become more available to African Americans to purchase or rent in. In Shawnee, this resulted in a shift in demographic from African American residents making up nearly 60% in the neighborhood in 1970 to over 88% just ten years later.³⁹ During these years, as the neighborhood shifted from a mostly white area to a neighborhood populated by upper- to middle-class African Americans, other influential events took place. These included the construction of I-264 in the late 1960s (something that tended to only occur in disenfranchised neighborhoods), the desegregation of schools and subsequent implementation of bussing, and an ever-present feeling of disinvestment by the rest of the city. However, despite the hurdles, the Shawnee neighborhood continued to thrive and was considered an ideal place to live by many of its residents, both the African Americans, as well as the whites who remained.

Historic Context: The Shawnee Neighborhood as a Suburban Development around the Olmsted Parks and Parkway System in Louisville, Kentucky and as a Transitional Neighborhood during Desegregation and the Long Civil Rights Movement

The Shawnee neighborhood's racial history is more pronounced than most in Louisville due in part to its role as a transitional neighborhood in the city. In order to continue to explore this context, one must first define a transitional neighborhood in this framework. A transitional neighborhood, for the purpose of this nomination, refers to a neighborhood that was historically and intentionally designed as a white-only neighborhood but which, as a result of housing policies, segregationist strategies, and other city-wide incidents, became a predominantly African American neighborhood. This term refers to neighborhoods that existed during the decades surrounding the Civil Rights Movement, when housing was at the forefront of the racial divide.

In the mid-twentieth century, Shawnee was mostly white working class, but its racial demographic was changing, unlike in neighboring communities. Louisville's Chickasaw and Russell neighborhoods were already primarily African American by the first couple decades of the twentieth century, before the first real wave of white flight took place. Alternatively, Portland remained primarily white, despite experiencing similar levels of poverty as the black neighborhoods it was surrounded by. Shawnee, however, was experiencing a turnover that changed its racial makeup.

Post-World War II suburban development in Louisville caused a significant growth in Louisville's size and population. Some of Louisville's earliest residential neighborhoods experienced a mass exodus of its upper- and middle-class residents. Part of this exodus was due to the idea of new, modern homes, the available transportation needed for suburbanization, and the idea to escape the flood-prone lowlands around the river. However, in the West End, the out-migration was also a product of racial tensions. The development of Rubbertown, a large chemical manufacturing district in the West End, and the subsequent air pollution, drove even more residents out. In addition to the environmental impact, the Flood of 1937 and increased industrialization dropped property values. This exodus caused neighborhoods in the West End to become devalued and marginalized. Then they took on a new social perception—a predominantly poor and African American neighborhood.⁴⁰

In the Shawnee neighborhood's heyday, many of the available amenities that made the area so desirable in Louisville were strictly segregated. Fontaine Ferry Park was completely segregated from its opening in 1905 until protests and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 led to its desegregation, and racial tensions in the West End led to its eventual closure just 5 years later.⁴¹ Furthermore, there were two larger parks in Louisville's west end, one of which, Shawnee Park, was exclusively for white residents while the other, Chickasaw Park, was for African Americans. These instances, in addition to the widespread housing practices, established Shawnee as a white neighborhood, seemingly devoid of African American presence. This sentiment was so inflexible that when times changed and African Americans embarked upon their legal right to purchase housing in the neighborhood, hundreds of white residents rose up in opposition.

When the Shawnee neighborhood was initially developed, restrictions were in place to ensure that only white individuals and families could move to the area. In 1917, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against the use of explicitly racial zoning plans in Louisville in a landmark case, Buchanan v. Warley. This case had nationwide implications, however, many border and southern cities throughout America, Louisville included, ignored this decision.⁴² In Louisville, the next course of action for individuals trying to maintain racial segregation was the use of racial covenants recorded in the sale of a property, commonly referred to as deed restrictions.⁴³ African Americans who wanted to purchase a home in Louisville in the first half of the twentieth century found it nearly impossible due to these deed restrictions. These “racial covenants” typically stated that no property in said addition or subdivision, or no specific property, could be sold to anyone who is not white. Despite these covenants being deemed unenforceable by the U.S. Supreme Court case Shelley v. Kramer in 1948, the existence of such language often was enough to prevent prospective African American homeowners from securing insurance or a loan.⁴⁴ Among the quasi-legal attempts to prevent African Americans from purchasing houses were efforts to purchase properties back from Black families that may have purchased them, and to ensure the continued use of deed restrictions.⁴⁵ Rationales for these actions often appealed to non-racial interests, such as maintaining property values. But it was not difficult to find those who would speak candidly, saying their reason for such drastic actions was to “keep the neighborhood white...and...keep property values from going down.”⁴⁶

Through the 1950s and 1960s, Shawnee slowly became an integrated community, albeit against the will of some of the neighborhood’s white residents. Despite the ongoing integrationist movement, the focus in Louisville as a whole still rested on keeping neighborhood segregated, as seen in the issuance of the 1958 Comprehensive Plan for Louisville and Jefferson County.⁴⁷ This plan not only encouraged the continued use of deed restrictions in order to maintain “good residential neighborhoods,” but it also sought to prevent the infiltration of blight, which many scholars recognize as a not-so-subtle way for people to discuss poor, non-white areas.⁴⁸ Moreover, the plan urged the utilization of federal funds to remove blighted areas as part of the somewhat newly established urban renewal programs. In Louisville, urban renewal programs “destroyed scores of historic buildings and pushed predominantly black families from their homes and businesses, intensified housing shortages, and increased segregation by pushing entire communities of black residents westward and away from downtown, further away from the white neighborhoods on the east end of town.”⁴⁹ This consequently made race relations in Shawnee more conspicuous.

In the mid-twentieth century, the racial discrimination in housing paired with urban renewal projects, not only segregated Louisville’s population by neighborhoods, but those practices also segregated those populations physically by the “replacing of homes and businesses with concrete and public housing.”⁵⁰ Urban renewal exacerbated these divisions using large-scale construction projects to not only wipe out historically black spaces, but to provide physical barriers to black mobility. In Shawnee, this was seen through the construction of I-264, Watterson Expressway, which today marks the district’s eastern boundary.⁵¹

Locally, African American residents and activists were demanding freedom and equality in housing choice, especially following the World War, where many African Americans fought for their country. One of the influential catalysts that increased white nervousness in the city was the G.I. Bill, including low-cost mortgages and low-interest loans. While these benefits were often withheld from black servicemen, white home owners could generate fear by claiming a new tool available to African Americans to purchase property. These fears were heightened in the early 1950s as local African Americans, the NAACP, and other allied groups led protests and sit-ins that eventually led to the desegregation of lunch counters, the Greyhound station, and various other businesses.⁵²

In 1954, the year that customarily marks the beginning of the traditional definition of the Civil Rights Movement, the Supreme Court ruled in Brown v. Board of Education that separating children in schools by race was unconstitutional. In Louisville, however, actions were not taken toward this aim until 1956, beginning a process that would take nearly two decades and a lawsuit to institute a busing program to remedy the ineffective attempts at integration of schooling. This marked the beginning of a series of legal pursuits to address racial inequalities and injustice in America and, in turn, Louisville. In 1964, the federal government passed the Civil Rights Act and four years later, the Fair Housing Act of 1968 was passed, both of which had huge implications locally, the former which helped usher in Kentucky’s “basic civil rights law barring discrimination in public accommodations and employment” in 1966, and the latter of which informed the Kentucky General Assembly’s passing of the Fair Housing Act the same year.⁵³ In Louisville, a public accommodations ordinance was passed in 1963 and a job ordinance was passed in 1965, both attempting to curb blatant racial discrimination and prohibitions.⁵⁴ Moreover, in Louisville the Open Housing Movement prompted an open housing ordinance that passed in 1967, something that marked a huge victory for Louisville's African American residents.

In 1962, the Louisville Human Relations Commission (HRC) was created with the purpose of improving race relations in the city and promoting the "attainment of equal opportunities for all races" within the city.⁵⁵ Still, it was not until three years later that a housing ordinance was passed, albeit one that was voluntary and thus relatively ineffective. In late 1966 and into 1967, the Open Housing Movement in Louisville reached a head, when African American leaders and open housing advocates became increasingly exasperated by the City of Louisville and its board of aldermen's failure to enact anything resembling an outright prohibition on discriminatory housing policies, one that could effectively legislate a change. In 1967, increased protest activity included sit-ins in the aldermanic chambers, local boycotts, a march led by Martin Luther King Jr., and a rally where Muhammad Ali spoke in favor of open housing.⁵⁶ After months more of intense struggles, in December 1967, the Louisville board of aldermen passed an open housing law, drafted by the HRC, that made it illegal to discriminate in housing based on race, with the HRC as the enforcement agency.⁵⁷

Racial tensions in Louisville seemed to reach a head when in 1968, a demonstration at the corner of 28th and Greenwood Streets in Parkland, just southeast of Shawnee, occurred to protest the arrest of two African Americans. At this rally, with roughly 400 people in attendance, a confrontation occurred resulting in a full-fledged uprising in the west end. Lasting for nearly a week, the uprising resulted in several buildings being burned, two deaths, almost 500 people arrested, and the arrival of more than 2000 National Guardsmen.⁵⁸ This solidified the growing unrest of the city's African American population and the desire for change in the city, particularly in the west end. Moreover, this also likely served as a motivation for the last wave of the west end's white flight.

It was during the mid-1960s when actions were taken to desegregate schools and parks and open housing became outlawed that the Shawnee neighborhood experienced the largest demographic shift from white to black, something that continued throughout the following decade.⁵⁹ "In less than a decade, over 40,000 people had been involved in real estate transactions in the area," marking the final transition from an area that was "once exclusively populated by the white middle-class" to "the home of black middle-class residents of Louisville."⁶⁰ By the end of the 1960s, approximately 15,000 white residents left Louisville's west end due to racial tensions and declining property values. In 1970, African Americans accounted for just over 59 percent of the Shawnee population, but by 1980, that number had risen to over 88 percent.⁶¹ This racial makeup of Shawnee has continued through into the twenty-first century.

Evaluation of the Significance of the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District within the contexts of Transitional Neighborhood in Louisville, Kentucky 1892-1980

The Shawnee Neighborhood is significant to the story of Louisville's development from the late-nineteenth century through the mid-to-late-twentieth century. Shawnee was first established as a direct result of the development of the Olmsted Park and Parkway system in Louisville. The Shawnee Neighborhood became Louisville's only neighborhood born as a direct result of this park system. Cherokee Park, the eastern portion of this undertaking, was constructed in an area that already had a significant residential and developmental presence. Iroquois Park, at the City's southern reaches, did not experience significant residential development until the years following World War II. In Shawnee, development occurred in conjunction with the park's completion with prominent residential dwellings popping up along the scenic parkway with segmented residential subdivisions being developed rapidly in the subsequent years. After the park was completed, Shawnee became an enclave of upper and middle-class white developments with increased infrastructure, transportation lines, and amenities being constructed to both entice movement to the area and set the neighborhood up as a desired destination for white Louisvillians.

The Shawnee neighborhood is significant also as a transitional neighborhood during the Long Civil Rights Movement. While the first demographic shift in the neighborhood began in response to the Great Flood of 1937. The city's eastern neighborhoods became more desirable for their larger lots, raised topography, and lack of integration. Initially, the threat of flooding led upper- to middle-class white residents to leave Shawnee for the suburbs, and those who left were replaced by middle- and working-class people. The second shift, however, occurred over the several decades that followed, primarily during the 1950s through the 1970s. This shift marked the transition from a white neighborhood to be a neighborhood for upper- to middle-class African American residents. This transition becomes an important factor in the larger story of race relations in Louisville, and the struggle for equal opportunity housing as well as many other Civil Rights. Discriminatory practices in the rest of the city were effectively pushing Black residents further to the west through social and legal tools that delineated white and Black spaces. The white residents in Shawnee were not welcoming of this shift, as some fought hard through deed restrictions and other inventive actions to prevent African Americans from moving into the area, even after such practices were deemed illegal. Despite this, and thanks to ongoing protests, demonstrations, and advocacy, African American entry into Shawnee succeeded. The Shawnee Neighborhood became a target for actions by the Long Civil Rights Movement and the associated legislation nationwide and locally. Their success in Shawnee helped achieve Civil Rights victories elsewhere.

Shawnee Historic District stands as an object lesson in the consequences of racial prejudice. Louisville's "West End" has become a term indicating the area with the highest concentration of African Americans, low property values, crime, and many other social ills. The beginning of this descent, the lowering of property values, began with a non-racial motive: to escape future threat of floods after 1937. By 1950, however, residents of the area found a new threat which propelled unprecedented number of individual decisions to leave the Shawnee neighborhood: the growing right of home ownership among the African American population. The fear over declining home values came true, but more through the economics of wholesale abandonment of the area than due to the identity of the new home owners. The subsequent social ills, of crime and drug use, can be accounted for by the many ways the City disinvested in the West End in terms of education and security. Other parts of the City, where African Americans could also choose to live, did not experience quite the same issues. Portland, just to the east of Shawnee, has maintained a racial makeup equivalent to Louisville—it is racially integrated with a majority of white residents. Neighborhoods directly to the south and east, such as Chickasaw, Parkland, and Russell, were historically black neighborhoods and remain that way today. Nowhere in Louisville was the extent of white flight as volatile, and as damaging to the social fabric, as in Shawnee. The Shawnee Historic District shows the power of social perspectives, and how assigning negative value to entire groups of people can lead people, both those holding the prejudices and those who are the object of that prejudice, to act against their own interests.

Evaluation of the Integrity between the Significance of the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District and its Current Physical Conditions

Each building's contribution to the district has been evaluated insofar as it helps reinforce and interpret the significant identity of the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District. The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District meets the definition of a district stated as the 4th term of Criterion C, it is "a significant and distinguishable entity whose components lack individual distinction." Because that significance is in Louisville's neighborhood developmental history, which began in the context of the Olmsted Park and Parkway System, and evolved in ways that reveal truths about the city's identity and its social values, the primary Criterion of eligibility is Criterion A.

The task of evaluating the overall significance of the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District means first evaluating its social and developmental significance and then evaluating whether there is an integrity between the resources' physical condition and the sense of significance. That will call for "... sometimes a subjective judgment, ... it must always be grounded in an understanding of a property's physical features and how they relate to its significance."⁶³ The evaluative lens for this district is that it was an area within Louisville that first developed as an upper-to-middle-class white neighborhood following the construction of arguably the most important city-wide development of its time that then evolved as social and cultural shifts occurred in the mid twentieth century. This gives a broad window for evaluating significance, 1892 through 1980. Those years were chosen to indicate the construction of Shawnee Park and the associated parkway system and a point when the African American population rose to a distinct majority in the neighborhood. Economic limitations and a changing nature in neighborhoods over time can lead to frequent alterations—sometimes repairs and sometimes an owner's change related to a design taste. These changes are sometimes judged as contrary to the Secretary of the Interior's Rehabilitation Standards. The evaluation of the impact of these individual changes have been weighed for their impact on the ability to perceive the primary resource, which is a district, and how well the individual building reinforces or damages the ability to perceive a historic working-class neighborhood.

The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District has a concentration that reflects both the original development of the neighborhood as an upper-class enclave and the evolution over time into a racially and economically diverse neighborhood with resources that serving as a manifestation of these identities. The physical nature of the neighborhood also continues to reflect the area's growth and development with the large recreational spaces along the river, larger lots along the parkways, commercial corridors along major thoroughfares, and middle-class housing in the various subdivisions. The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District meets the definition of a district, "a significant and distinguishable entity whose components lack individual distinction".

The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District possesses integrity of location. The neighborhood grew and thrived as a direct result of its location next to the iconic Shawnee Park and the Ohio River, both of which continue to serve as important features. The locational aspect has remained the same with the resources in the district, and the district as a whole, remaining in their historic location. Because of this, the district retains integrity of setting. The elements and resources in the neighborhood demonstrate how Shawnee was first developed around the park and parkways, grew to be a burgeoning white suburb, and finally evolved into a significant African American neighborhood and one of the largest neighborhoods in the city. Some alterations are present, however, most notably with the construction of I-264 on the district's eastern boundary. The district possesses sufficient integrity to convey its historic significance as an important aspect in the development of Louisville.

The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District also retains integrity of design. The overall design and layout of the district has remained largely unchanged. With its intact physical layout and grid-like streets, large recreational spaces, major thoroughways, and mixed-use resources befitting a self-sufficient neighborhood of its size. The district also features several intact blocks of subdivisions with minimal non-historic intrusions. Moreover, the neighborhood has experienced relatively few demolitions over the years. Additionally, the district retains integrity of materials. When evaluating the district's material character, through the lens of Criterion A with an emphasis on the property's identity as an economic and racially evolving neighborhood, the practicality of historic and present materials become important definers of that identity. Some changes have been made to the materials over time, but the new materials are used for practical purpose and effect, just as the original materials were. With the evolving character of this neighborhood and the widespread disinvestment experienced prior to transition, some loss of materials over time is not inconsistent with the significant story that this neighborhood has to tell.

The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District also retains integrity of workmanship. The workmanship of buildings demonstrates the skills and methodologies from when the resources were constructed. With the exception of some of the resources that have been altered over the years, the workmanship of the resources demonstrates how builders reacted and followed national trends and how the transitional nature of the area affects the built environment. Furthermore, some of the high-style residential buildings and larger resources, such as schools, still retain exceptional integrity of workmanship. Lastly, the workmanship utilized in the development of NRHP-listed Shawnee Park and the associated parkways is superbly intact. Overall, the district features an impressive mix of architectural styles ranging from impressive high-style houses to more modest middle-class housing, most of which were typically individually detailed.

The feeling and association of the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District is retained. The resources within the district are largely extant and exhibit the character of the neighborhood's history. The integrity of location, setting, materials, design, and workmanship allow the extant features of the district to convey a strong sense of a neighborhood that grew from an upper-class white enclave to a predominantly black upper-to-middle-class neighborhood in Louisville's west end.

Verbal Boundary Description (Describe the boundaries of the property.)

Beginning at the northwestern corner where West Broadway passes below I-264 north, northwest, and west along the western and southern boundary of I-264 to the point where I-64 bisects the Shawnee Golf Course, then east and north to the extent of the Shawnee Golf Course and the southern bank of the Ohio River, then west along the southern bank of the Ohio River, under the Shermon Minton Bridge, which carries I-64, then continuing west and south along the southern and eastern bank of the Ohio River to the southwestern boundary of Shawnee Park, then east along the northern side of West Broadway to the beginning.

Boundary Justification (Explain why the boundaries were selected.)

The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District boundaries includes the entirety of the historic Shawnee Neighborhood between West Broadway, the Ohio River, and I-64 and I-264, only deviating to include the entirety of the Shawnee Golf Course and a sliver of Portland that was cut off by the construction of I-264, thus physically creating a physical boundary between it and the rest of Portland and solidifying a shared identity of this portion with the rest of Shawnee.
