Summary Paragraph

This nomination proposes to expand the boundaries of the Portland Historic District (NR #80001615). The listed Portland Historic District is roughly bounded by N. 33rd St on the east, I-64 to the north, N. 37th St. to the west, and Pflanz Ave. to the south. The district includes roughly 51 acres with 137 Contributing resources. In addition to the 137 Contributing resources to the existing Portland Historic District, the expanded district encompasses an additional 52 resources, either individually listed or Contributing to other districts, such as the Lower West Market Street Historic District.<sup>1</sup> This expansion seeks to enlarge the boundary of the Portland Historic District to encompass the majority of the neighborhood. The new district boundary roughly is defined by West Market Street, Interstates 64 and 264, and the Louisville and Indiana Railroad. The larger district consists of single-family and multi-family residences, schools, religious facilities, commercial and industrial buildings, recreational facilities, and significant thoroughfares and landscapes. The area proposed for the expansion of the Portland Historic District adds approximately 1,137 acres (1,188 acres total), 3,378 Contributing Resources (3,515 total), and 1,410 Non-Contributing Resources (1,442 total). These numbers include the re-classification of resources from the original district listing to update their Contributing status. This Boundary Increase also extends the Period of Significance from 1812-1976, beginning with the construction of the Squire Earick House, the earliest known building in Portland, and ending with 1976, bringing it up to the fifty-year threshold. The district physically shows how an autonomous community began as a rival with Louisville for river commerce, and eventually was absorbed into Louisville as a West End neighborhood.

General Setting of the District

The neighborhood is largely broken up into three separate sections, all of which combine to make the cohesive Portland Neighborhood. The first of these is the westernmost portion which consists of the original heart of the City of Portland and the major railyard area of the former Kentucky and Indiana Terminal Railroad (K&ITRR). “Portland proper,” which is how the original part of Portland was referred to in the early 19th century, has been partially lost over the years due to both natural challenges and manmade changes during the historic period, including frequent flooding, the construction of a floodwall, the construction of two interstates, and the construction and expansion of the railroad lines. Much of the early residential portion of Portland remains and is included in the original boundaries of the Portland Historic District. This westernmost portion of the new expanded district also consists of the large railyard whose presence has come to define the southwest portion of Portland while also supporting the ongoing residential development of the area and its working-class identity.

Map showing the three portions of Portland referred to in the General Setting: Red—proposed new boundaries of the district. Yellow—original district boundaries; Neon Green—westernmost portion; Blue—central portion; Pink—easternmost portion.

The second, central portion, which is by far the largest and most uniform, consists of the heart of the residential core of Portland. This area personifies the mid-19th to early-20th century neighborhood with commercial thoroughfares, smaller bisecting residential streets, and throughout, a smattering of community, educational, religious, recreational, and social centers and buildings. In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, there were two streetcar lines that serviced the residential and communal core of the expanded Portland, each of which ran along major thoroughfares that are still integral to the city. The easternmost, third portion of the expanded district, was the location of Portland's industrial and manufacturing hub. It was vital in transitioning Portland from an autonomous city into a neighborhood of the City of Louisville.

The layout of the most western portion of Portland is indicative of its era as a self-containing city, featuring the earliest residential buildings, a commercial core, and many of the assets expected of a city such as a school, cemetery, and library. As development opportunities were exploited in the areas between Portland and Louisville, the two cities began to connect and develop toward each other. This development eventually came to be known as the larger Portland's core. This area grew with residential and commercial activity, allowing Portland to transition into one of the largest neighborhoods in Louisville. As the area continued to grow in the early 20th century, Portland became an industrial and manufacturing hub for Louisville's West End. The establishment of the K&ITRR railyards helped define the limits of residential development of what continued to be known as Portland, an area much larger than the original Portland proper.

Outside of the boundaries, the expanded Portland Historic District is surrounded by the Ohio River to the north, and by other Louisville neighborhoods that had their own identities. To the east exists Downtown Louisville, the commercial, municipal, and commercial center of the City of Louisville since its founding. In it there are numerous NRHP individual and district listings that outline the expansive and eclectic history of Louisville. To the south and west are the Russell and Shawnee neighborhoods, both of which have national Register-listed historic districts. The Russell Historic District (NR #80001617) consists of the heart of the residential portions of the historic Russell Neighborhood, which is significant as the first residential enclave for middle-class black Louisvillians in the early 20th century and as a significant collection of late 19th and early 20th century architecturally significant houses. The Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District (NR #SG 100011688) is significant as a neighborhood born out of the Olmsted-designed Park and Parkway System in Louisville and as a transitioned into a predominately African American neighborhood during the Civil Rights era.

Much of the character of Portland's general layout/configuration from the late-19th to mid-20th century remains. The changes have been on a small scale, such as building demolitions or construction of a new multi-family complex, but the overall design and flow of the neighborhood is unchanged. Aside from the construction of I-64, I-264, and the floodwall--which form the northern and western boundaries for the neighborhood--there have been no large-scale alterations, leaving the three sections of Portland intact.

Unlike other, more planned suburban neighborhoods of Louisville, such as Shawnee, the residential areas that make up the core of Portland were not intentionally platted and subdivided. Instead, the growth of Portland occurred primarily in the earlier years and was much less regulated and occurred more organically as Portland and Louisville both expanded, especially following the mid-19th century annexation of Portland. Most of what constitutes the expanded Portland Historic District was developed and densely populated by the mid-to-late-19th century. As such, the buildings and resources within the district span from the early-to-mid-19th century through the 21st.

Boundaries of the Expanded Portland Historic District

The original listing of the Portland Historic District identified that it was only nominating “Portland Proper” as opposed to the “Portland Enlargement.” That latter area is vital to understanding the neighborhood’s wider, more impactful history. Despite claiming to represent the original portions of Portland, the original district had a Period of Significance that stretched into the 1930s, when the rest of Portland had been developed and was widely established. The original district only focuses on the areas that it deemed as most important to the original community, without evaluating the historic significance that the rest of the neighborhood had on the development of Louisville’s West End or the important role that Portland, as a whole, played on the earliest years of Louisville’s expansion.

As such, the current boundaries of the expanded Portland Historic District more accurately depict the historic and modern boundaries of the Portland neighborhood, one of the more substantial and significant neighborhoods in the City of Louisville. There are two inconsistencies between the new proposed boundaries of the Portland Historic District and the current recognized borders of the neighborhood. The first is that there is a sliver that was cut off from the rest of Portland with the construction of I-264 and is still situated on the west side of that major construction and bisecting intrusion. This portion of Portland has been so far removed from the greater Portland neighborhood, that it was recently included in the NRHP boundaries for the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District (SG 100011688, listed 2025). Similarly, there is a section on the far east that is situated between the proposed expanded Portland Historic District and Downtown Louisville that is being excluded from this nomination but is typically considered part of the neighborhood. This section is east of the railroad line and consists of heavily developed, demolished, and transformed city blocks of modern industrial space and surface parking lots. The intactness of this industrialized portion of modern Portland does not match the mostly intact layout of the section included in this nomination, west of the railroad line. Instead, these eight blocks have been altered and no longer retain the feeling that is preserved in the rest of the district. Thus, the railroad line serves as a three-dimensional boundary between the heavily altered portions of the neighborhood to the east and the more intact Portland Historic District to the west.

Site: Plat Development and Layout of Streets

Portland was originally platted in two sections, in 1814 and 1817, both under the direction of land speculator William Lytle. These early developments in Portland were in the northwest corner of the original district area, near the former wharf. These developments consisted of residences, business, and warehouses, many of which were associated with trades concerning the river and wharf. Extant buildings from this early period of Portland include the Squire Earick House at 719 N. 34th Street. Following the construction of the nearby canal, the portage industry in Portland boomed, becoming one of the major port towns on the Ohio River; this economic boom was a catalyst for further expansion to the south and east. Following the annexation and subsequent independence of Portland in 1842 and 1852 respectively, Portland continued to grow towards Louisville but was still geographically separate with a street grid and street name system that did not integrate with Louisville's grid and street naming patterns. By the 1870s Portland saw a period of growth towards Louisville that saw these incongruities disappear. Following the 1875 street name change, Portland saw more development from Louisville's western neighborhoods, which made it difficult to recognize Portland as anything more than a neighborhood of the City. The early 20th century saw the construction of more residences in Portland, and other western Louisville neighborhoods, due to the westward push of industry from Louisville. A series of floods devastated the area, leading to the construction of a levee system, which removed almost any trace of the former Portland Wharf that the neighborhood was founded on.

Since the early 19th-century, Portland had laid its streets in a grid pattern. The orientation of the grid reveals which time period buildings were built, but sometimes more than the grid, the basic property layout was informed by the earliest transportation routes between Louisville and Portland, which paralleled the river. For example, the old parts of Portland have a street grid that orients itself with the Ohio River, following the bend. Newer street grids, following the westward expansion of the City of Louisville, orient themselves in-line with the streets throughout the rest of Louisville. In 1875, most of Portland's street names were changed to follow the naming system in-place in Louisville proper. This naming change was more-or-less the final act in the absorption of Portland by the City of Louisville,

Physical Character of the District

The spatial layout and infrastructure of the Portland Historic District can be seen as a physical depiction of the early development and ongoing growth that the area experienced in the mid-19th through the early-20th centuries while the physical makeup of the individual resources within tell the story of how the neighborhood has fared since. As Portland expanded and was eventually annexed by Louisville, the infrastructure of the city seamlessly blended with the City of Louisville and, as such, Portland was served by the westward expansion of the eventual streetcar line and the southern expansion of the K&ITRR as it crossed the iconic K&I Bridge.

The unusual layout of Portland's streets has been a character-defining feature since they were planned in the mid-19th century. The streets, particularly those in the northern half of the district, follow the peculiar serpentine route of the river with the angle of the roads getting steeper until they reach the roads extending westward from downtown Louisville. The southern half of the district, which is further removed from the river, follows the east/west pattern of the rest of Louisville proper and the historic West End. The gradual converging of the angled streets with the east/west streets makes for a few odd intersections and city blocks, but, despite the odd layout, the district as a whole features a basic grid-like pattern.

The layout of Portland gave priority to making travel easier. For instance, the establishment of streetcars supported early models, as they made movement throughout the neighborhood much easier. The streetcar routes followed the existing roadway system, of Portland Avenue and Bank Street, the former of which was the route of the original Portland Turnpike, a plank road that connected the two cities as early as 1818, and the latter of which follows the route of the original Louisville and Portland Street Railroad that dates back to the mid-19th century.

Portland's parcels were densely packed along city blocks and were typically similar in size and shape, with narrow lots and decent, but sometimes shallow, setbacks which allow for a modest front yard while leaving ample room behind a house. In many of these lots, the rear of the property is dominated by secondary buildings and garages which provide access to the property from the alleyways. However, before the widespread adoption of the automobile and modern amenities, these lots were designed as such to allow for rear privies. These privies were often located in the rear of the lot, far removed from the house, and along alleyways to allow for waste removal services. There is a great deal of uniformity in the district's residential, rectangular lots, from those in Portland Proper and throughout the residential core and beyond. While there are exceptions, primarily in the larger lots occupied by architecturally finer houses, the majority of the district's lots are uniform in shape, as are the scale of the building, and other defining design features like setback and massing. Although there are some houses in Portland that feature modern driveway additions off the main facades along the street, these are rarities, and not the common developmental trend, as they are not historically consistent with the time Portland was developed. On the whole, Portland lots tend to be narrower and deeper, the density for a working-class neighborhood, but also situated in a way that could accommodate a privy removed from the house, while also allowing ample space for single-family living. Today, many of the lots in the expanded Portland Historic District have garages or secondary buildings on the rear of the lots, often facing alleyways, in places where privies once stood. This was just one way that the district as a whole evolved with the times and grew to accommodate and progress with the expanding automobile era. A historic property's ability to grow and evolve with the era is one way that a neighborhood as a whole retains its character well outside its period of establishment.

Different from our current subdivisions that are restricted to a single use by zoning ordinances, Portland's residential areas held a mix of uses: commercial, community, religious, and municipal spaces. The main thoroughfares also had higher intensity commercial clusters. As a result, Portland retains the appearance of a self-contained walkable neighborhood with the feeling of a cohesive community.

The Portland Neighborhood, with its 4,957 resources has 3,515 contributing resources, 1,442 non-contributing resources, including 945 vacant lots. A majority of the resources are residential, consisting of a single narrow, but long, lot with a detached garage at the rear of the parcel accessed by a system of named alleyways. Many of the single-family resources have a small set-back from the right-of-way, typical of the time period with a small front yard, and nearly no side yard. The narrow lot orientations lend themselves to Shotgun form houses, which is the predominant architectural type in the district.

Resources Overview

As one of Louisville's oldest neighborhoods, the district contains a variety of building types and architectural styles, though most resources lack formal stylistic expression. The resources reflect the transition of typology and architectural style in Louisville throughout the mid-nineteenth and into the late twentieth centuries. Early residential examples include types in northern Kentucky such as shotguns (single and double passage), camelback, double and single pen. As the late-nineteenth and early twentieth century progressed, more defined architectural styles began to emerge, including Greek Revival, Italianate, and Queen Anne, and then bungalows, American foursquare forms showed the area had developed into a suburb of Louisville.

Project Methodology

In 2018 and 2019, there were multiple Certified Local Government (CLG) funded projects that set out to capture photographically and to document each building within the expanded Portland Historic District on a KHC Site Form. The results from this survey work were invaluable in assessing the individual resources within the district and the change in materiality and integrity of the built environment. However, additional work was also completed in this undertaking. First, a comprehensive list of all extant district resources was compiled using information obtained from the Jefferson County Property Valuation Administrator, the local tax office. Moreover, this data was utilized to obtain a construction date for each parcel, which includes key attributes such as parcel number, improvements to the property, and other key information such as square footage, zoning, and owner. Along with current and historic photographs, which help identify how the building has changed over the years, the key dataset used for the purposes of this nomination is the construction year. The construction date offered by the PVA office was often an estimate. When dates are unknown, the PVA often used a placeholder date of 1900. This usually indicates a rough approximation, meaning the building could be built some thirty years before or after 1900. When such examples were found in Portland, one of this project's preservation professionals would estimate the date of construction using experience, as well as consulting historic maps such as atlases, Sanborn Fire Insurance maps, and USGS topographic maps. Additionally, other steps were taken to identify whether or not that resource will be labeled Contributing or Non-Contributing. These steps are outlined below. The PVA date of construction is regarded as more reliable for dates after 1980.

Judgements of Contributing vs. Non-contributing

When looking at the entire Portland Historic District, the district retains sufficient intactness so that it can speak to the seven aspects of integrity (see that discussion in the Statement of Significance): location, design, setting, materials, workmanship, feeling, and association. Part of that determination came from assessing the physical change within each resource. In judging whether a particular property would be assessed as Contributing or Non-contributing, various aspects of a property were weighed more heavily insofar as those features reinforced the district's identity, first as a standalone city, then as a neighborhood of Louisville, but all the while, an identity that is distinct to Portland. Portland is an interesting mix of high style architecture and simply-designed workforce housing, all of which present the rich history of the district and the diverse eras of growth experienced therein. Physical cues from buildings are useful pieces of evidence of the history of the neighborhood. The buildings in Portland document the economic status, culture, and heritage of a community that played a significant role in the development of Louisville. A resource might have been altered over time; however, those modifications can be just as important as the original historic fabric because they illustrate well cultural shifts that help define the district. Therefore, if the extant resources retain enough historic features and form to convey their construction and use during the Period of Significance, then they should be contributing elements to the Portland Historic District. The Historic Integrity Assessment Tool for the Portland Historic District (Contributing and Noncontributing) was created to help review the integrity of the resources by ranking each resource in one of four categories.

As is commonplace among working-class neighborhoods, especially those that have a history spanning over one hundred years, many of the buildings have undergone material changes. These changes can include replacement of exterior material, small additions, and a change in fenestration. Additionally, some resources have experienced more noticeable and severe changes, such as unsympathetic additions. Many such changes occurred during the historic period; others have occurred afterward. These changes largely, however, are seen as a part of the definable character of working-class neighborhoods, meaning that working-class families, who are often financially burdened in ways that affluent families in nicer neighborhoods are not, pride themselves on remodeling their house, even if it is in ways that fall outside of the Secretary of the Interior's Standards for Rehabilitation, used by SHPOs, cities with local historic preservation ordinances, and the preservation community in general. Such an example seen throughout working-class communities is in the replacement, or covering, of original exterior wall cladding with something newer, "prettier," and easier to maintain, such as vinyl siding. The same is true for replacement windows. Within the expanded Portland Historic District, alterations will be gauged for how they impact a resource's ability to contribute to the district's historic sense of time and place, not the change's impact on the neighborhood as a highly aesthetic architectural resource. A building will be considered Contributing as long as the building still conveys its form, features, and details necessary to reinforce the district's historic identity. These determinations were made for each building that was built within the Period of Significance and are outlined in the table below.

The following details the architectural ranking system utilized in this nomination to determine which resources were Contributing and which were Non-Contributing, and to explain the basis of judgement and evaluation applied each resource. If the extant resource retains enough historic features and form to convey its historic construction and use, then it will contribute to the expanded Portland Historic District. The Historic Integrity Assessment Tool for the Portland Historic District (Contributing and Non-Contributing) was utilized to help review the integrity of the resources by ranking each resource in one of four categories.

Rank 1: These properties are contributing as they possess a high level of historic integrity. They retain historic materials, original window and door openings, character-defining features, and building form. These buildings look very much like they did originally. See photographic examples below.

Rank 2: These properties are contributing but have less integrity than a 1 ranking. They retain some historic materials, original window and door openings, character-defining features, and building form. The buildings are more altered than Rank 1 buildings, but they still look very much like they did historically. See photographic examples below.

- Porch enclosures or removals: The porch remains discernable with the presence of columns or column bases, steps, and/or the use of reversible enclosure materials such as glazing panels.
- Replacement cladding: Deemed acceptable if it approximates historic siding in dimension and reveal.
- Replacement doors and windows: Deemed acceptable if the majority of historic opening locations and dimensions remain intact and the replacement windows and/or doors do not significantly change the building's historic character.
- New additions: New additions should be located on the rear elevation and not highly visible from the front façade.

Rank 3: These properties have the lowest level of intactness and still remain Contributing. They retain enough of their historic design to be recognizable as a historic building within the district. See photographic examples below.

- Porch enclosures or removals: The porch remains discernable with the presence of columns or column bases, steps, and/or the use of reversible enclosure materials such as vinyl, aluminum, and/or wood siding. Generally, the installation of doors and windows does not detract from the integrity of the enclosed porch because the other porch features remain intact.
- Replacement cladding: Deemed acceptable if it approximates historic siding (vinyl or aluminum) or if it dates to the period of significance such as permastone or asbestos shingle siding.
- Replacement doors and windows: Deemed acceptable if the majority of historic opening locations and dimensions remain intact and/or the replacement windows and/or doors do not significantly change the building's historic character.
- New additions: New additions should be located on the rear elevation and not highly visible from the front façade. However, if additions date to the period of significance and do not substantially alter the building's form or massing, they could retain historic integrity.

Rank 4: These properties are noncontributing as they have lost their form, window and door openings, and/or many historic materials. These buildings are no longer recognizable as part of the district's historic identity. See photographic examples below.

- Porch enclosures or removals: The permanent enclosure of porches through the removal of all identifying features and the use of a more permanent siding material like masonry make front porches appear more like additions on the front façade.
- Replacement cladding: Unsympathetic replacement materials, such as brick veneer on frame structures, that date after the period of significance and substantially alter a building's historic appearance.
- Replacement doors and windows: If the majority of the historic fenestration pattern is modified; or if the majority of windows and/or doors are removed and/or relocated; or if unsympathetic replacement doors and/or windows are installed, then this is typically deemed a major, unsympathetic alteration.
- New additions: Additions that are located on the front façade or are substantial in size and alter the building's form and massing, lead to a noncontributing determination. These additions should typically date after the period of significance.

While the resource table below attempts to display the date of construction of each resource within the district, many of these dates are approximate and cannot be precisely verified. The majority of the dates were gathered from the Jefferson County (Metro Louisville) Property Valuation Administration (PVA). It is known that the PVA regularly assigns 1900 for historic buildings that have no other documented age. While the PVA dates are approximations, other methods of estimation were readily available, such as the utilization of Sanborn Fire Insurance Maps, United States Geological Survey (USGS) Topographic maps, and other documentation. This information is helpful in corroborating the PVA's estimates, and provides a fuller account of the development, growth, and changes occurring in the neighborhood over the years.

Statement of Significance

Summary Paragraph

The proposed expansion of the Portland Historic District meets Criterion A. This district is significant in the areas of Community Planning and Design and Social History, focusing on an 1812-1976 Period of significance. The district's significance is evaluated within the historic context, "The Founding of Portland, the Early Expansion of Louisville, and the Development of Louisville's West End: 1850-1980." The Portland Historic District is significant because it gives great evidence of the way in which Louisville grew over time, giving us special insight into the City's transition, first in the mid-19th century and then again from 1900-1949. It helps us recognize how and when the transition from two separate cities, Portland and Louisville, into one occurs, and what factors accelerated that transition. We can see differences in the way that lots are developed in the 19th century and how they are developed after the early 20th century that give us great insight into this story of how the city grew and adapted. Moreover, the Portland Historic District provides unique insight into the development of Louisville's West End from the turn of the 20th century through the 1980s. The growth of Portland during this time differs from the other established neighborhoods that make up Louisville's West End, largely due to the steady demographics of the area and the lack of external influence on the community, most notably in the lack of gentrification and white flight. Portland remained rooted in its original identity as a distinct community, something that was propagated by its self-sufficiency, which made it unwavering in its ability to withstand outside manipulations. This is made all the more significant when compared to the surrounding neighborhoods which grew and evolved in a much different way, despite being affected by the same economic woes. This identity has remained a core tenet of Portland and continues through the 21st century. Today, Portland is considered among Louisville's oldest and biggest neighborhoods, one that still retains a unique identity, cultural presence, and a built environment that represents the 200 years of growth and is a chronicle of the development of this important Louisville community.

Historic Context: The Founding of Portland, the Early Expansion of Louisville, and the Development of Louisville's West End, 1850-1980

Beginning as an independent city that rivaled Louisville as the center of river trade along the Falls of the Ohio, Portland has a history that predates its association with Louisville but which is fundamentally tied to the city's eventual expansion west. Exhibiting all the characteristics of a stand-alone city, Portland thrived in the early-to-mid-19th century before being annexed by Louisville in 1852, after which, the neighborhood grew to embody the character of a self-sufficient neighborhood outside of the city center, complete with the infrastructure, housing stock, and commercial amenities necessary at the time. As the years passed, Portland established its own identity while being intrinsically linked to the growth and industrial boom of Louisville and the river trade that accompanied it.

Portland was first platted in 1814, followed by an additional platting in 1817. Early development was slow, with the construction pace picking up in the 1820s, following the 1818 construction of a major road linking Portland and nearby Shippingport. Early development was concentrated on warehouses and businesses which served the steamboat traffic on the Ohio River. As Portland demonstrated its advantage over Shippingport, its success led it to expand southward and eastward, closer to Louisville, throughout the century. In 1837 and 1842, Louisville annexed land at its western reaches. While this land was technically Louisville, what grew in this land was frequently identified with Portland.

By the 1880s the community of Portland was turning into the Portland neighborhood of Louisville, with Louisville's development surrounding the area on all sides. Portland's river-related industry slowed following a series of floods, and was replaced by the development of its industry, residences, and businesses which flourished. The main thoroughfare of the community, Portland Avenue, started to grow with large mansions, and shotgun worker's houses on side streets. The 20th century saw more floods as well as the construction of a floodwall and levee system, eventually topped with Interstate 64. Unlike the nearby West End neighborhoods of Louisville that were heavily affected by the influx of heavy industry and racial tensions, Portland's population remained relatively consistent throughout the early parts of Louisville's Post-World War II suburban development. That prosperity did not last, as post-1970 Portland was named one of the most "economically depressed" neighborhoods in the city.<sup>2</sup>

Throughout the years, from an independent city to one of the largest West End neighborhoods, Portland has maintained its own identity: buoyed by its history, its self-sustainability, and its distinctiveness to dissuade change and persevere. These characteristics, which were illustrative of the residents and the community as a whole, set Portland apart from the rest of the West End, not only in its history and longevity, but also in its steadfastness, exceptionality, and significance.

The resources in the area range in date from the 1820s to the 1970s and there is an interesting mix of high style architecture and simple workforce housing, all of which represent the rich history of the district. Many of the buildings are significant for their value as evidence of history not for their architectural design and, when combined with the other features of the district, such as the setting, the collection of diverse resources, and the unique layout, the significance of the district is made clear. The expanded Portland Historic District's resources, as well as the district as a whole, document the economic status, culture, and heritage of a community that played a significant role in the early expansion and development of Louisville and the city's West End. The Period of Significance for the Portland Historic District is 1812-1976, beginning with the construction of the Squire Earick House, the earliest known building in Portland, and ending with 1976 to bring it up to the fifty year threshold.

From the late 18th century to the early 19th century, six communities developed around the Falls of the Ohio River. These include Portland, Louisville, and Shippingport in Kentucky as well as Clarksville, New Albany, and Jeffersonville in Indiana. The circa 1824 “Map of the Falls of the Ohio” depicts these. Their history is tied to the Falls, a series of rapids that was the sole large navigational obstacle in the Ohio River between Pittsburgh and New Orleans. This obstacle required most of the shipping on the river to either begin and end at the Falls or to portage. The six communities around the falls greatly benefited from this.<sup>3</sup>

Note the existence of the Turnpike Road between Louisville and Portland, which loosely followed the course of the Ohio River and is the location of present day Portland Avenue<sup>4</sup>

William Lytle established Portland after he purchased the land in 1811 and 1813. Lytle was a prominent land speculator from Cincinnati who founded towns like Portland along the Ohio River where the shipping industry was beginning to boom.<sup>5</sup> The town of Portland was laid out in two parts: Portland proper, platted in 1814 by Alexander Ralston for Lytle, and Portland enlargement, platted in 1817 by Joel Wright for Lytle.<sup>6</sup> The early development of Portland was slow as purchased lots were not improved. However, the 1820s saw the construction of warehouses, residences, and businesses. Portland became a rival of Shippingport, which was located to the northeast and established a few years earlier. According to Stottman, "Because Portland had a more favorable location downstream from the falls and had a much larger harbor than the earlier settlement, it drew business from Shippingport. Furthermore, in 1818, the first major road linking the town of Louisville above the falls with the new town of Portland, below the falls, was completed. This plank road, named the Portland and Louisville turnpike, bypassed Shippingport and made the transportation of cargo from Portland to Louisville much more convenient."<sup>7</sup>

There are extant buildings from this era of Portland History. The Squire Earick House (719 N. 34th Street) was built circa 1820 and served as residence, court, and jail for Earick, the town magistrate. Circa 1839, the French population, under the direction of Bishop Benedict Joseph Flaget, established Portland's first church, Notre Dame du Port. Translated to the Church of Our Lady (3511 Rudd Avenue), the parish was comprised of the Irish, German, and French families of Portland. The parish erected a series of three church buildings on the site. The current building was built in 1873.<sup>8</sup> While these properties are not fundamentally different from buildings that were built after Portland became part of Louisville, nor are they developmentally indicative of belonging to a separate municipality, their presence allows the expanded Portland Historic District to fully showcase the chronology of Portland, from its earliest founding through the modern era.

The portage industry was an economic catalyst for Portland, so the construction of a canal should have threatened its high profile business. However, Portland continued to grow as steamboats that were too large for the canal continued to stop in Portland and portage. Many businesses focused on the servicing and resupply of steamboats and their passengers. The 1840s and 1850s were a prosperous time for, Portland as it rapidly became one of the major ports along the Ohio River.<sup>9</sup>

The Cedar Grove Academy was founded in 1842 as a boarding school for girls and operated by the Sisters of Loretto. It was originally known as St. Benedict's Academy. Bishop Chabrat of Bardstown acquired the 4-acre tract in 1841, which included land bounded by 35th Street (now Cedar Grove Terrace), 36th Street, Rudd Avenue, and Northwestern Parkway. As early as 1841 the tract was known as Cedar Grove and contained a frame structure known as "the tavern." The Sisters later built brick additions to this building facing Rudd Avenue. According to Jones and Kinsman, "The date of construction is not known but it was prior to the 1870s since a photograph

In 1828, the Commonwealth of Kentucky incorporated Louisville as a city with Shippingport in its boundaries. Portland, however, remained a separate town. In 1834, the Kentucky legislature gave Portland its charter.<sup>11</sup> The City of Louisville annexed Portland in 1837, but that action was short lived. Louisville did not fulfill promised made to Portland in the annexation agreement, including connecting the town to Louisville’s railroads. By 1842, Portland had regained its independence from Louisville, but “the pressures of its rapid growth at this time proved to be too much for the community and it was annexed again in 1852.”<sup>12</sup> The main issues surrounding the annexation and growth of Portland and Louisville stemmed from the expansion of the railroad to the area.

The issues around a railroad stretching from Louisville to Portland date back to the 1830s. The Lexington & Ohio Railroad (LORR) was chartered in 1830 with plans to run from Lexington, through Louisville, to Portland. However, the City of Louisville had qualms about this route as it was still in competition with Portland over river traffic, trade concerns, and Falls business. A resolution was reached with Louisville conceding to the extension of the rail line, a plan that was at the center of Portland’s agreement to annexation. However, the great Panic of 1837 halted construction of the extension of the LORR from Frankfort to Louisville, an interruption that lasted a decade. It was during this period that Louisville became motivated to extend the line to Portland in an effort to “protect investments, boost business, and help the city to expand.”<sup>13</sup> As such, in 1837 construction began on the line to connect the two cities, set to run along High Street to Portland, however, due to pushback from Portland residents, was rerouted one block south “along the privately-owned Louisville and Portland Turnpike, currently Portland Avenue.”<sup>14</sup> Finally, in the 1840s, after continuing disagreements between the LORR and Louisville, the state intervened and “split the LORR into two companies – LORR that would run from Lexington to Louisville and the Louisville and Portland Railroad (LPRR) that would run from Louisville to the Portland wharf.”<sup>15</sup> The issue of the railroad in Portland serves as a foreshadowing of the importance that the railroad played in the Portland neighborhood’s development and overall identity, as seen in the presence of the interurban railroad, the eventual location of the Youngtown Yard and the presence of two major rail lines passing through.

After annexation, Portland continued to operate separately from the City of Louisville and continued to grow. Louisville received the taxes and fees Portland generated but did not otherwise engage with the community. This was an advantageous relationship for both communities. The 1856 "New Map of Louisville" shows Portland as a geographically separate area to the west with the same platted street grid and street names. There is a platted area between to connect the two, but it was largely undeveloped. Thus, Portland appears to remain quite separate from Louisville.<sup>16</sup> This map also shows the presence of the LPRR connecting Louisville and Portland with a greater network that extended east through the Commonwealth. However, what is not shown on this map, is the location of the U.S. Marine Hospital that was constructed in this connector area between 1845 and 1852, and is regarded to be the best extant antebellum hospital in the U.S.

Detail view of the 1856 "New Map of Louisville" showing Portland and the eastern connector to Louisville.<sup>17</sup> Note the LPRR route stretching from Downtown Louisville to the heart of Portland.

In the mid-19th century, the desire for improved transportation in Louisville was high. The city's population was consistently growing and there was a growing need to move people and supplies as part of the war effort in the mid-1860s, thus, the city initiated a street railway system. In early 1863, the First and Second Street Horse Railroad Company was established and the following year, the rights were assumed by the Louisville City Railway (LCRR).<sup>18</sup> By 1865, the original routes had extended west from 12th Street to Portland, along the original LPRR route, all the way to a point near the Portland ferry landing. In the following years, both the boundaries of Louisville and the expanse of the streetcar lines grew, as the city expanded and nearby areas were annexed and developed. Portland eventually got additional lines as the service expanded to all of Louisville's suburbs and nearby attractions ( ). The fact that the streetcar line's first expansion outside of its original layout was west to Portland is indicative of how important Portland was to the growing Louisville and how the two areas were wholly linked. The presence and sprawling nature of the streetcar line allowed Portland residents to easily travel throughout the City of Louisville and its surrounding areas, something that was deemed essential to mid-19th century urban life.

In the 1870s, the area between Portland and Louisville began to fill in as the City of Louisville continued to grow. This suburban development almost eradicated the spatial separation that had differentiated the two communities for so long. The early platting of this area between Portland and Louisville shows the origins of its unique street layouts that. In an effort to unify the two areas, the City laid out streets to roughly follow the path of the original Turnpike and thus the Ohio River. As Portland and Louisville developed the area south of Portland proper in the 20th century, streets were laid out to prioritize the roads extending west from Louisville rather than to favor roads moving south from Portland. The 1875 "City of Louisville Map" shows the western developments joining Portland's original street grid. According to Stottman, "This situation indicates that at that time, Portland's eastern boundary was not clearly defined."<sup>19</sup> However, what is not yet evident in this map is the renaming of Portland's streets, which the City of Louisville orchestrated in 1875. North-south streets were named numerically as they were in Louisville, but some of the east-west streets were named to in accord with Portland's history, such as Lytle and Rowan Streets. The Portland street names that did not conflict with any of Louisville's street names, and remained unchanged, including Portland Avenue and Bank Street.<sup>20</sup> While Portland had officially been a part of Louisville for over 20 years, this was seemingly the final act of assimilation.

Thus, more steamboats used the canal. Unfortunately, this meant fewer boats moored at Portland to use the portage system. Additionally, in 1870, the first railroad bridge to cross the Ohio River in Louisville was completed, known as the 14th Street Bridge. The railroad became a major competition for steamboats transporting goods and significantly decreased their business. When construction was completed, this crossing was the westernmost bridge crossing on the Ohio River and it was the longest iron bridge in the U.S. Portland no longer had the shipping industry which created the community and fostered its growth, but the railroad would play a large role in its continued growth. To emphasize this, in 1886, a railroad bridge connecting Portland and Indiana was completed: the K&ITRR Bridge. This ended the ferry service, which since 1812, had been a vital part of Portland's economy.<sup>24</sup>

With Louisville's western neighborhoods surrounding Portland, it was difficult to recognize the town of Portland as the autonomous town it had once been. It was becoming the Portland Neighborhood of Louisville. While the Portland wharf was dying, the neighborhood itself was not. Residences and industry moved to and developed around Portland Avenue and the accompanying interurban railroad lines, Portland's main link to Louisville. The avenue was lined with large, grand mansions while side streets were platted into narrow lots for working class, shotgun style houses. Interestingly, much of what is considered the heart of Portland today was developed after annexation during the late 19th century.<sup>25</sup> The 1903 "Map of the City of Louisville" shows the developments around Portland Avenue. The Louisville Free Public Library established the Portland Branch Library in 1905 as the third library branch in the city. In 1913, the current Beaux Arts style building (3305 Northwestern Parkway), opened with funding from the Andrew Carnegie Foundation. The library is situated at the intersection of Northwestern Parkway, Portland Avenue, and 33rd Street, a location determined to be most accessible for those living in Portland.<sup>26</sup>

As people and industries moved west, more housing was constructed in Portland and other neighborhoods in western Louisville. According to Watrous, "Most of the housing built in the 1920s in western Louisville were modest bungalows which blue-collar workers could afford, and which were located conveniently near the new industrial plants."<sup>27</sup> It was during the early 20th century that aspects of Portland's industrial identity took shape. One large-scale development that still characterizes Portland is the large Youngstown Rail Yard in the district's western boundaries. The Youngstown Rail Yard, established between 1907 and 1913, solidified portions of Portland as working-class and associated with the major industrial developments of the time. Not only had the railroad become one of the most significant and largest industries of time, but its presence in Portland, which stretched back several decades and whose growth mirrored that of Portland as a whole, had only grown from its original inception to include two river bridges and several freight and passenger lines. The Youngstown Rail Yard was the gigantic depot yard associated with the K&ITRR that was situated just south of the K&ITRR Bridge and the connection between the rail line reaching north, east, and south. It was an important depot that encouraged growth in the area, both of working-class housing and of industrial enterprises.

Similarly, the east end of Portland had established itself as an industrial center. The rail line grew, then owned by the Pennsylvania Railroad, and the 14th Street Bridge completed the eastern boundary of the district. The eastern and western boundaries of this district are established around the historic railway lines from Louisville's formative years.

Although Portland had endured major floods during the 19th century, there was always an economic incentive to rebuild the wharf area. However, by the 20th century, the wharf area was mostly obsolete. The 1937 flood devastated the wharf area and older sections of Portland that were located close to the river. Because of the magnitude of the flood, local and federal agencies developed a plan to protect Louisville from future floods. A series of floodwalls and levees were proposed across Louisville and Jefferson County. Construction began in 1946 after another major flood occurred in 1945. The plan was constructed in phases, with the last portion completed in the 1980s in southwest Jefferson County. The Portland levee required all land north of Rudd Avenue to be completely cleared, including the buildings and streets. According to Stottman, “When the flood levee was completed in 1947, the Portland Wharf had been erased from the landscape and

In addition to an expressway system in Louisville, the Portland Canal received improvements that helped lead to economic growth. In July 1956, Congress approved funding for major improvements to the older canal system. From 1958 to 1965, the work was completed in three phases: the original canal was widened to 500 feet; a new 1,200 ft lock was added to supplement the old main lock; and Dam 41 was reconstructed. The entire system was renamed McAlpine Lock and Dams in honor of William H. McAlpine, an U.S. Army Corps of Engineers engineer who was involved in the improvement efforts. Almost immediately operational and maintenance costs were reduced, and the lock speed was nearly double. Thus, the tonnage passing through the Port of Louisville increased and freight rates decreased because shipping times decreased.<sup>31</sup>

Portland Neighborhood and the “West End”

Western Louisville, today commonly called the West End, is comprised of many distinct communities that developed at different times for different reasons. Thus, there is a lot of diversity in types of buildings, architectural styles, and people in the West End. Some of the communities in the West End began as separate towns, like Portland and Parkland. Whereas others developed as downtown Louisville extended west and as “streetcar suburbs,” like Russell and Shawnee. Many of the towns/neighborhoods were established in the 19th century. The development of mule cars and street cars made suburban growth possible. For the first time people who could not afford to own carriages did not have to live within walking distance of their place of employment. Furthermore, the construction of Shawnee Park along the Ohio River drew many people to the West End and developers quickly platted lots in the vicinity.<sup>33</sup>

In the late 19th century there were African American residential enclaves in Louisville, specifically near areas now known as the Russell and Parkland Neighborhoods. In the early 1900s, more wealthy African Americans began purchasing homes west of downtown in predominately white neighborhoods. Therefore, a housing segregation ordinance was passed in 1914 that designated specific streets and districts, including most parts of the West End, as white-only and black-only.

In 1915, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) created a case to test the legality of the ordinance. Known as Buchanan v. Warley, white real estate agent Charles Buchanan sold a vacant lot to William Warley, a black man, in a white-majority block at North 37th Street and Pflanz Avenue in Portland. When Warley was not allowed to own the property, the NAACP filed suit, and the Kentucky courts upheld the ordinance. In November 1917, Supreme Court Justice William Day overturned Louisville's segregation ordinance because "the Fourteenth Amendment had been created specifically to protect African Americans in cases involving federal rights; however, the broader purpose of the amendment was to protect all persons from discriminatory legislation by the states. Even though the Louisville ordinance claimed to promote peace by preventing race conflict, that aim could not be accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created and protected by the Federal Constitution."<sup>34</sup> Residential patterns in Louisville since the 1920s have shown (and continue to show) increasing levels of segregation. The West End suffered from "white flight" in the 1930s and then again in the 1960s during the Civil Rights movement, decreasing the white population by approximately 50 percent each time.<sup>35</sup>

Post-World War II suburban development in Louisville caused a significant growth in Louisville's size and population. Some of Louisville's earliest residential neighborhoods experienced a mass exodus of its upper and middle class residents. Part of this exodus was due to the idea of new, modern homes. However, in the West End, the out-migration was a product of racial tensions. The development of Rubbertown, a large chemical manufacturing district in the West End, drove even more residents out. This exodus caused neighborhoods in the West End to become devalued and marginalized. Then they took on a new perception—predominantly poor and African American.<sup>36</sup>

Unlike other parts of the West End, Portland's population remained stable during this change. Many of its residents were well established in the neighborhood as multi-generational residents. Thus, they had developed a close-knit community. However, the Portland neighborhood still lost some of its base population, experienced a decline in home values, and saw an influx of low-income families. Despite these changes, Portland had maintained its population of approximately 20% African Americans, which was the same as Louisville as a whole. "Portland was seen as a white enclave surrounded by African American neighborhoods."<sup>37</sup>

According to Stottman,

"The Portland Neighborhood is Louisville's most economically depressed, as median incomes have been at or below poverty level since the 1970s. This trend of poverty mirrors that seen in the neighborhoods surrounding Portland as well, known collectively as the West End. Although Portland shares the experience of poverty with the West End, it is very distinct from those communities that surround it in several ways. The most obvious of these is racial, as the surrounding communities are mostly African-American and Portland is mostly white. ... Although a large number of Portland residents have left the neighborhood over the last 40 years and there has been an influx of new residents representing a variety of ethnic and racial backgrounds, most of the neighborhood comprises multi-generational residents. Portland is also very distinct in its history and heritage materialized in the large number of historic building stock still extant throughout the neighborhood. In many parts of the neighborhood, large numbers of abandoned or derelict properties can be found. The percentage of renters to homeowners has grown rapidly, much of it low rent. There also has been the increased development of government subsidized housing within the neighborhood. It is not unusual to see abandoned or rundown buildings, as absentee landlords maintain their properties poorly. This vision of Portland has led to many negative stereotypes and perceptions of the neighborhood that plague many economically depressed communities. However, despite these issues, Portland remains a strong community with a rich history and many well-maintained historic structures, all assets that can be used to help revitalize it.”<sup>38</sup>

In 2017, Louisville Metro Government’s Office of Redevelopment Strategies launched an interactive story map created by urban planner Joshua Poe, which demonstrates the ways that redlining has affected housing development, disinvestment, and lending patterns in Louisville since the 1930s, which were sparked and perpetuated by the Home Owner’s Loan Corporation (HOLC). By layering data sets such as vacant properties, building permits, and property values, the map displays how 1930s redlining actions had consequences that remain evident today.

In 1933, the New Deal-era’s HOLC was created as a federal entity nominally to increase the stock of affordable housing. In concert with the worldview of power holders at the time, the HOLC initiated widespread redlining across the United States. Redlining, which is the practice of denying access to loans or credit based on where someone lives or their race, was utilized significantly during this time. As local custom, deeds, subdivision regulations, and law limited where African Americans were allowed to live, HOLC created maps throughout the United States that assigned grades to neighborhoods to indicate which were ready for investment and which were to be avoided. In these reports, information such as the level of “infiltration” by non-whites was included as basis of desirability for lending institutions making house loans.<sup>39</sup>

In HOLC’s map of Louisville from 1937, these maps assigned grades (1-4) to neighborhoods to show their desirability for investment. African American, immigrant, and low-income neighborhoods were often given low grades, eliminating their access to mortgage insurance or credit for decades. Although the HOLC was discontinued in 1951, the impact of disinvestment from redlining is still evident in Louisville and other cities today.<sup>40</sup>

According to the HOLC map, the majority of the Portland Neighborhood was fourth grade property, the lowest level of property, with a small amount of third grade property. Today, the Redlining Louisville map shows that the neighborhood is still predominately white with a median income under $46,000. It has a moderate amount of vacant properties, low property values, a moderate-to-high amount of mortgage application denials, under 50% homeownership, and very few building permits issued for development.<sup>41</sup> The effects of historic redlining are still apparent in the Portland Neighborhood today.

During this time, HOLC was not the only federal program set up to segregate American cities. Throughout the years leading up to, and during World War II, public housing was in high demand but was explicitly and officially segregated.<sup>42</sup> When American veterans returned home from WWII, the federal government made specific requirements for insuring mortgages, something that was necessary before banks would offer loans to lower income or working-class families, including a prohibition on sales to African Americans.<sup>43</sup> Further, federal entities, such as the Federal Housing Administration and Veterans Administration, who many veterans relied upon for home insurance and loans without down payments, not only prohibited African Americans from acquiring loans, but they refused to insure mortgages for white homeowners in neighborhoods that had an African American population, thus further racially segregating the country.<sup>44</sup> These were just a couple of the policies that affected every major American city and resulted in outright, obvious and almost total, segregation.

The redlining map helps explain why Portland is economically depressed and contains buildings that are abandoned or in need of serious repair. It is that way because redlining made it harder for developers to get loans to undertake improvement projects there. Perhaps, because it had a higher proportion of white residents, it managed to escape the effects of Urban Renewal, which was known colloquially among Black residents as “Urban Removal”. Large-scale demolitions of blighted areas in the 1950s and 1960s was not as focused on Portland in the same way that it was upon majority-black neighborhoods of Russell, Parkland, and downtown. The major modern developments that have modified the Portland neighborhood were the levee and Interstate 64.

Second, Portland had become one of Louisville’s poorest neighborhoods by the 1970s. However, this prompted residents to study Portland’s more prosperous history. In 1974, the Portland Museum was established, and interest in Portland’s history grew among its residents. “The museum quickly became an institution dedicated to Portland’s rich history and facilitated efforts to reconnect its residents with that history.”<sup>45</sup> The residents of Portland take great pride in their history as one of the oldest communities. This pride has led to a strong neighborhood association and festivals to bring awareness to the neighborhood and raise money. By taking pride in their history, the residents have, knowingly or unknowingly, taken pride in the historic structures as well. Many of the buildings in the neighborhood have received inexpensive “updates,” which is common in older working-class neighborhoods nationwide. This shows continued building maintenance and use. However, due to the lower socioeconomic status of the neighborhood residents, this work was not always best preservation practices but what people could afford.

Development of Louisville’s West End; Portland Compared to the Rest of the West End

The 200-year history of Portland is first and foremost a context designed to understand a city which no longer exists but at one time rivaled Louisville for river-city prominence. Portland was annexed and became the first bastion of Louisville’s westward expansion. However, to understand its latter-day significance, it is necessary to understand how Portland fits within the larger context of the city’s West End, of which Portland is the oldest element. The annexation of Portland and the immediate development of the area separating Downtown Louisville from Portland Proper marks Louisville’s first expansion west, beginning a trend that would soon bring the city’s boundaries west to the banks of the Ohio River after its southward bend. Portland's history as a self-sustaining city and its proximity to Downtown allowed for it to be developed long before the further westward reaches of Shawnee or the development of the neighborhoods to the south, including Parkland, Chickasaw, and Russell. This history of development, accompanied by physical distinctiveness, seen in the establishment of the Youngstown Railyard and the presence of locally-based community spaces, allowed Portland to retain an individualized sense of community and identity, despite the growth and expansion of Louisville in the surrounding areas.

In the late 19th and early 20th century, Portland remained physically separate from the rest of Louisville, and socially considered itself a definably different area. Locally, Portland maintained a somewhat autonomous economy and social landscape with commercial, industrial, and manufacturing resources, social clubs and centers, municipal sites, and an overwhelming sense of community that was rooted more deeply in "Portland" than in larger Louisville city identities.

In the early-to-mid-20th century, the West End of Louisville as a whole experienced a widespread white flight and mass exodus of residents that changed the physical landscape of the area as well as the demographic makeup. There were different factors throughout this time that led to the developmental trends of the various West End neighborhoods. Communities such as Parkland and Russell were historically African American, and had developed social infrastructures by the 1920s, something that created a strong pull for migrants coming from rural Kentucky and the South during the Great Migration. These areas had a recognized interconnected ecosystem of Black institutions that created social, economic, and cultural space for individuals and families to find work and build a life. Conversely, neighborhoods, like Shawnee, experienced significant white flight as the middle-and-upper-class residents sought to escape the pressures of integration and dangers of flooding by moving to the economically promising areas to Louisville's east and south ends. This led to the eventual transition and complete demographic shift that has since come to define the Shawnee area.

In the mid-20th century, when other, predominantly white working-and-middle-class neighborhoods, such as Shawnee, transitioned from white residents to black, Portland remained unaffected. In Portland, there was a deeper sense of identity, rooted in history and community, that the other neighborhoods perhaps did not experience. This deep-rooted identity matters because white flight in Louisville was often driven by both racial anxieties and a desire to relocate into suburbs that symbolized rising middle-class status. Portland, however, had never been oriented toward the middle class. Its residents tended to value local belonging and cultural familiarity over suburban aspirations. While the broader West End included both middle- and working-class residents, Portland's population remained consistently and overwhelmingly working-class, shaped by blue-collar and industrial employment at places like the L&N shops, the Portland Wharf, tobacco warehouses, and later, smaller manufacturing plants. Portland residents, on the whole, did not experience this degree of mobility, or threat of suburban emigration. Many long-standing families were deeply tied to wage labor, union networks, and close-knit kin groups.

Another major factor distinguishing Portland from other West End neighborhoods was the nature of its housing stock. Portland's residential architecture consisted largely of small, modest shotgun houses, one- to two-story frame cottages, and workers' doubles built in the mid- to late-nineteenth through the early-20th centuries. These structures were affordable but not attractive to speculative real estate developers, who played a significant role in shaping patterns of white flight elsewhere in Louisville. In Shawnee, Parkland, Chickasaw, and Russell, real estate firms marketed newly built early-twentieth-century homes—bungalows, foursquares, and brick cottages—to white families aspiring toward social advancement. When desegregation and blockbusting pressures emerged in the 1950s and 1960s, real estate firms actively encouraged white homeowners to sell and relocate to developing suburbs. Portland, by contrast, was not prioritized by developers or real estate agents for post-war suburban transition. Where white flight elsewhere followed the pathway of rising property values leading to relocations to newer suburbs, Portland's lower property values anchored its population in place. The neighborhood's housing thus acted as a stabilizing force. For many families, Portland's affordability represented security rather than decline.

Lastly, external perception reinforced internal identity; it still does today. Portland developed a reputation over time, sometimes romanticized as rugged and loyal, sometimes stigmatized as poor and insular, but in both cases, it was understood as different from the rest of the West End. This reputation shaped how both residents and outsiders viewed the community. In neighborhoods where white flight occurred, residents were motivated by the desire to maintain social distance from either perceived decline or racial integration. Portland, however, already saw itself as a place apart.

These factors allowed Portland to exhibit an identity that both defined the West End, but was distinguished within it. After annexation, Portland grew, particularly in the areas between Portland Proper and Downtown Louisville, and continued to grow for the next several decades. However, as economic growth and external factors wreaked havoc on the historic stability and character of the West End as a whole, Portland remained steadfast. Unafraid of racial integration, scapegoating, redlining, or external influences, Portland persisted. Portland, and its residents, stayed true to the neighborhood, placing more importance on the perpetuation of community's identity than any external factors. Despite decades of economic hardships, suburbanization, or increased traffic and infrastructure, Portland has remained, unapologetically, Portland. This is something that is still seen today, as it prides itself on its "river connections, multi-cultural history, and immigrant spirit" as "Portland's close-knit community of extended families is centered around parks, churches, and locally-owned businesses."<sup>47</sup>

The expanded Portland Historic District is significant to the story of Louisville's earliest development and expansion. Portland was first established in the early 19th century as a river city that rivaled Louisville's trade and success. In those early years, Portland was a city that competed with other cities along the Ohio River. As Louisville set its sights on expansion, Portland was the first to be annexed. The Portland Historic District tells the full story of the founding of the independent City of Portland and the initial industrial growth and westward expansion of the City of Louisville. The district retains excellent integrity, both in the density of historically significant resources, but also in the setting and layout that is unique in that the roads follow the river, but which also depict the logical expansion and infill of area between Portland and Louisville following annexation. In those formative years, the area in the intermediate space between Louisville and Portland was platted to both follow the existing infrastructure, such as the Turnpike, and combine the two cities by blending the east/west road in each.

Moreover, Portland also consists of some of the most architecturally and historically significant resources in the City of Louisville. From grandiose, high-style houses, the NHL U.S. Marine Hospital, the railroad infrastructure associated with the earliest railroad crossings of the Ohio River in the region, and countless other significant resources. These, along with the rest of the Contributing resources, combine to make up the expanded Portland Historic District and accurately depict the history and diversity of Louisville's oldest and one of the largest neighborhoods.

While the original Portland Historic District encompasses the original Portland Proper, the expanded Portland Historic District provides physical evidence of Louisville's earliest expansion westward. The district gives a comprehensive narrative of Portland's history, its growth, its incorporation into Louisville, and its continued existence as a distinctive Louisville neighborhood, one that defies the typecasts that are typically utilized for West End communities. The strength of Portland's identity is witnessed by the expansion of the community's identity. The area of growth between Portland and Louisville may have officially been the City of Louisville, but the people in that growth area were proud to declare it greater Portland. The significance of that two-pronged identity, one metropolitan and one very local, speaks of the importance that neighborhood identity retains in Louisville.

The proposed expansion of the Portland Historic District boundary more completely shows the significance of how the small river city grew to embody industrial vitality, urban development, and progress in the early history of Louisville. Throughout the district, remnants of each of the developmental eras of Portland's history can be seen, from the earliest extant buildings within the original City of Portland, the late-19th century expansion of Louisville westward as the city's growth exploded, the working-class housing development trends that characterized much of the heart of the expanded Portland Historic District as industry grew and housing shortages arose, and finally through the mid-20th century decline and 21st century revitalization. The expanded Portland Historic District is significant as it fully tells the story of the early establishment of a river city and the early annexation, westward expansion, and creation of Louisville's West End. This district encompasses several individual resources that are significant to Louisville's early success, its history, and its growth, but more importantly, the district as a whole showcases this early significant chapter in the success of Louisville as the foremost Kentucky city and one of the most important river cities along the Ohio River.

Evaluation of the Integrity between the Significance of the expanded Portland Historic District and its Current Physical Conditions

Each building's contribution to the district has been evaluated insofar as it helps reinforce and interpret the significant identity of the expanded Portland Historic District. The Portland Historic District meets the definition of a district stated as the 4th term of Criterion C, it is "a significant and distinguishable entity whose components lack individual distinction." Because that significance is in Louisville's earliest expansion, which began in the early 19th century with the establishment of Portland and has evolved in ways that reveal truths about the city's identity and its values, the primary Criterion of eligibility is Criterion A.

The task of evaluating the overall significance of the expanded Portland Historic District means first evaluating its developmental significance and then evaluating whether there is an integrity between the resources' physical condition and the sense of significance. That will call for "... sometimes a subjective judgment, . . . it must always be grounded in an understanding of a property's physical features and how they relate to its significance."<sup>48</sup> The evaluative lens for this district is that it is an area that was first developed at the turn of the 19th century and has experienced every manor of development, from homes for the wealthy elites, buildings highlighting the industrial expansion, and working-class housing. The neighborhood evolved as Portland grew from a self-sustaining city to the earliest and arguably most important expansion of the original city of Louisville. The district encompasses the land that was the first to be annexed by Louisville, which grew with the city to meet the growing industrial and suburban needs of the time. This all gives a broad window for evaluating significance, 1812 through 1976. These years were chosen to indicate the construction of the earliest extant buildings through the 50-year mark. Economic limitations and a changing nature in neighborhoods over time can lead to frequent alterations—sometimes repairs and sometimes an owner's change related to a design taste. These changes are sometimes judged as contrary to the Secretary of the Interior's Rehabilitation Standards. The evaluation of the impact of these individual changes have been weighed for their impact on the ability to perceive the primary resource, which is a district, and how well the individual building reinforces or damages the ability to perceive a historic working-class neighborhood.

The expanded Portland Historic District has a concentration that reflects both the original development of the formerly independent city and the evolution over time into a diverse working-class neighborhood with resources that serve as a manifestation of these identities and the 200-year growth of the neighborhood. The physical reality of the neighborhood also continues to embody the area's growth and development with a large industrial presence on the east end, several local public community spaces, commercial corridors along the historically significant thoroughfares, larger lots interspersed among the working-class housing, working-class housing set up in a grid-like pattern that closely follows the path of the river, and various other land uses that are typical of standalone cities from the 19th century. The expanded Portland Historic District meets the definition of a district, “a significant and distinguishable entity whose components lack individual distinction”.

Location and Setting

The Portland Historic District possesses integrity of location with its intact distinctive street grid, parks, cemetery, railroad tracks, and variety of lot sizes and shapes. These elements demonstrate how Portland began as an independent city and then merged geographically with Louisville and became one of its largest neighborhoods. Moreover, the neighborhood was established as a direct result of its location along the Ohio River and it grew along those banks as it merged with Louisville, first municipally and later geographically. The locational aspect has remained the same with the resources in the district, and the district as a whole, remaining in their historic location. Even the layout of the streets in the district are informed by the earliest years of Portland, something that has not fundamentally changed in nearly 200 years. Because of this, the district retains integrity of setting. The elements and resources in the neighborhood demonstrate how Portland was first developed as its own city that grew to the City of Louisville’s first westward expansion. Two major alterations to the setting include the levee/floodwall along the northern portion of the neighborhood and the construction of the interstates. Furthermore, there have been building demolitions because of disinvestment and blight, which has decreased the district’s historic density. However, the district still possesses enough intactness to convey its historic significance as an important part of the development of Louisville.

Design

The expanded Portland Historic District also retains integrity of design. The overall design and layout of the district has remained largely unchanged. With its unique grid-like layout that follows the river to the north before adopting the more typical east/west layout in the southern half, the intermittent recreational/communal spaces, major throughways that follow the historic thoroughfares and rail lines, the continued use and existence of major rail infrastructure, and mixed-use resources befitting a self-sufficient neighborhood of its size. The district also features several intact blocks of residential dwellings with minimal non-historic intrusions and some of the most architecturally and historically significant resources in the City of Louisville. Additionally, the district retains integrity of materials. When evaluating a district’s material character, through the lens of Criterion A with an emphasis on the property’s identity as an economically diverse and evolving neighborhood, the practicality of historic and present materials become important definers of that identity. Some changes have been made to the materials over time, but the new materials are used for practical purpose and effect, just as the original materials were. With the evolving character of this neighborhood and the widespread disinvestment experienced prior to transition, some loss of materials over time is not inconsistent with the significant story that this neighborhood has to tell. Many of the alterations to the district’s buildings, such as enclosed porches, replacement siding, and replacement doors/windows are common in older working-class neighborhoods nationwide. These inexpensive “updates” do not significantly impact integrity if the extant resources retain enough historic features and form to convey their original construction and use. Look to the Historic Integrity Assessment Tool at the end of Section 7 for a more in-depth look at acceptable non-historic material change to Contributing resources.

Workmanship

The workmanship of buildings demonstrates the skills and methodologies from when the buildings were constructed. The workmanship of the contributing resources in the Portland Historic District demonstrates how builders reacted to and followed popular national trends. The buildings are a mixture of frame and brick with similar forms differentiated with stylistic details of the period. There are grand avenues with larger, more elaborate buildings and side streets with smaller, modest buildings. While similar, these smaller homes were generally not “cookie-cutter” they were individually detailed. Furthermore, some of the high-style residential buildings and larger resources, such as schools, still retain exceptional integrity of workmanship. Overall, the district features an impressive mix of architectural styles ranging from impressive high-style houses to more modest middle-class housing, most of which were typically individually detailed.

Feeling and Association

The feeling and association of the expanded Portland Historic District is retained. The resources within the district are largely extant and exhibit the character of the neighborhood's history. The integrity of location, setting, materials, design, and workmanship allow the extant features of the district to convey a strong sense of a neighborhood that originated around the turn of the 19th century and grew from Louisville's first neighborhood into one of Louisville's largest. The Portland Historic District is still clearly associated with its origins and history of development, from the 1820s through the middle of the 20th century. Since the design and setting of the district are intact, visitors can experience the passage of time through the built environment. They can see how Portland was developed and evolved, which also demonstrates the community's unique identity.

Verbal Boundary Description

Beginning at the north corner of the intersection of the K&ITRR Bridge and I-64, then proceeding northwest along the river to the eastern boundary of the 22nd Street off ramp, then continuing south to the western point where the I-64 overpass crosses over 22nd Street, then west along the southern boundary of I-64 along the ramp of I-264, then continuing south along the eastern boundary of I-264 to the point where it passes over Market Street, then east along the northern boundary of Market Street to the northwestern corner of the point where the rail line overpasses Market Street, then north along the western boundary of the rail line to the point of the beginning.

Boundary Justification

The expanded Portland Historic District boundaries includes the entirety of the intact historic Portland neighborhood between I-264 and the rail line between 13th and 15th Streets that retains integrity. The only deviation from the actual boundaries of the Portland neighborhood include the omission of eight blocks on the east end that have been heavily altered and demolished since the Period of Significance, and the sliver on the west side of I-264 that, after the bisection of the neighborhood by the interstate, began to associate more with Shawnee, and thus is included in the boundaries of the Shawnee Neighborhood Historic District. This reflects the boundaries of the earliest areas annexed by the City of Louisville during its early growth and expansion.
